During the short and turbulent reigns of the succeeding emperors, the drains were neglected, the waters were suffered to increase, and the road became nearly impassable. At length Nerva resumed the task, and Trajan constituted it with such perseverance, that the whole country from Treponti to Terracina was drained, and the Appian Way once more restored. During the decline and fall of the empire, the marshes were again overflowed, and again drained by Cæcilius Decius, in the reign of Theodoric. Many of the Roman pontiffs subsequently turned their attention to the same object. Boniface VIII. and Martin V. began to cut new canals; and Sixtus Quintus followed up the task. But his death put a stop to the work; and the quarrels, with regard both to temporals and spirituals, in which succeeding popes were involved, left them little leisure and less resources for objects of this nature. The stagnating waters were thus left to their natural operation, till at length these plains reached the desolate condition in which they were found by Pius VI; who resolved to remedy the evil. To hasten the work, he established himself at Terracina. The marshes were again drained; new levels were taken; new ditches and new canals were cut; the land was divided and planted; and the road restored on the substructions of the Appian Way. For this work, Pius VI. will receive the thanks of every traveller; but this, like most of his other undertakings, exposed him to the satire of his contemporaries; and it became a proverb, when talking of sums expended in extravagance, to say, "they were thrown into the Pontine Marshes." Plin. 3, 5. —Liv. 2, 34. 6, 21. 9, 28.— *Dio. PONTIUS, HERENNIUS, a general of the Samnites, who surrounded the Roman army under the consuls T Veturius and P. Posthumius. As there was no possibility of escaping for the Romans, Pontius consulted his father what he could do with an army that were prisoners in his hands. The old man advised him either to let them go untouched, or put them all to the sword. Pontius rejected his father's advice and spared the lives of the enemy, after he had obliged them to pass under the yoke with the greatest ignominy. He was afterwards conquered, and obliged, in his turn, to pass under the yoke. Fabius Maximus defeated him, when he appeared again at the head of another army, and he was afterwards shamefully put to death by the Romans, after he had adorned the triumph of the conqueror. Liv. 9, 1, &c.——Cominius, a Roman who gave information to his countrymen who were besieged in the capitol, that Camillus had obtained a victory over the Gauls. Plut.——Aquila, a lieutenant of D. Brutus, who perished at Mutina. Cic. Fam. 10, 33.—— Pilatus, the Roman governor of Judæa, under whom our Saviour was crucified. Tacit. Ann. 15, 44.

PONTUS, a country of Asia Minor, bounded on the north by the Euxine sea, on the south by Cappadocia, on the west by Paphlagonia and Galatia, and on the east by Armenia and Colchis. It was reckoned famous for its poisons and poisonous herbs. The name of Pontus was first applied by the Greeks to the whole tract of country along the southern shores of the Euxine, and thus included territories to which the subsequent kingdom of Pontus did not extend, as Sinope, Trum, Heraclea, &c., which are all described as "in Ponto;" the appellation was, however, afterwards limited to the country east of the river Halys, and which, after having been dismembered from Cappadocia, was erected into a satrapy under the Persian kings, and finally into a separate kingdom, about 300 years before the Christian era. The most remarkable of its kings was Mithridates the great, whose ambitious designs upon the kingdom of Cappadocia, of which he had been stripped by the Romans, plunged him into hostilities with the latter people, and brought on a war which was one of the longest and most difficult in which the Romans had ever been engaged with a foreign power. During the struggle, Mithridates became master of the greater part of Asia, and of the Hellespont, subdued nearly all the islands of the Ægean sea, and compelled the whole of Greece to pay him tribute; but his career was suddenly checked by Sylla, who defeated his armies in the plains of Chæronea, and afterwards at Orchomenus, when peace was made between the two contending parties, Mithridates consenting to resign some of his conquests, and to indemnify the Romans for the expenses of the war. This peace, which appears to have been no actual cessation of hostilities, was but of short duration; for on the death of the Bithynian Nicomedes, who left his kingdom to the Romans, Mithridates disputed their right to the possessions of the deceased monarch, and declared open war against them: he was attacked by Lucullus, who defeated him in several bloody engagements, and drove him into Armenia, after which he was again defeated by Pompey, and compelled to fly for safety into the country of the Scythians, where he died by his own hands. The kingdom of Mithridates was henceforward gradually divided into several portions: that next to Galatia was called Pontus Galaticus, being governed by a Galatian prince, the northern and eastern parts received the name of Pontus Polemoniacus from Polemon, whom Antony raised to its throne; Pontus Cappadocius touched upon the great province whence it received its name. In the time of Diocletian and Constantine the Great, these divisions were again altered, and Pontus was divided into two parts; the western of which, called Heleno-Pontus, after Constantine's mother, included the old Pontus Galaticus, and part of Paphlagonia, as far as Sinope; the other, or eastern province, preserved the name of Pontus Polemoniacus. Virg G 1, 58, *Appian. PONTUS EUXINUS, the ancient name for the Black Sea. It washed the shores of Asia Minor on the south, those of Sarmatia on the east and north, and those of Dacia, Mœsia, and Thracia on the west. Its greatest length is 640 miles, and its average breadth about 240: it covers a superficial extent of 102,800 square miles. It abounds with fish, and receives the waters of more than forty rivers, three of which, viz. the Danube, Borysthenes, and Tanais, are the largest in Europe. It was formerly called Axenus, from Ashkenaz, the son of Gomer, who settled on its shores in Asia Minor. But this original being forgotten in course of time, the Greeks explained the term by ἄξενος inhospitalis, in which they were favoured by the inhospitable and stormy nature of the sea itself, as well as by the savage manners of the people who dwelled around it; in the course of time, however, when their ferocity had been gradually softened by intercourse with foreign nations, and by the numerous colonies, which had been planted on their coasts, the name of the sea was changed to εὔξενος hospitalis. The Greeks were for a long time only acquainted with its southern and eastern shores, and doubted at first whether they should reckon it a part of the great ocean, or a separate sea, until about 650 years B. C. the Cizicenians and Milesians settled the point by sailing round it: they fancied also that it had a subterraneous communication with the Caspian. Its modern name, the Black Sea, has been obtained from the gloomy appearance of its black and rocky shores, covered with dark and impenetrable woods, as well as from the dreadful storms and thick fogs with which it is infested in winter. Pind Nem 4, 79.—*Orph. POPLICOLA, M a consul who was informed, as he was offering a sacrifice, that a sedition was raised in the city against the senate. Upon this he immediately went to the populace in his sacerdotal robes, and quieted the multitude with a speech, from which circumstance he was surnamed Læmas. He lived about the year of Rome 404. Liv. 9, 21.—Val. Max 7, 8.——Calus, a consul, who, when besieged by the Gauls, abandoned his baggage to save his army. Cic ad Herenn. 1, 15.——Læmas, a Roman ambassador to Antiochus, king of Syria. He was commissioned to order the monarch to abstain from hostilities against Ptolemy, king of Egypt, who was an ally of Rome. Antiochus wished to evade him by his answers, but Popilius, with a stick which he had in his hand, made a circle round him on the sand, and bade him, in the name of the Roman senate and people, not to go beyond it before he spoke decisively. This boldness intimidated Antiochus; he withdrew his garrisons from Egypt, and no longer meditated a war against Ptolemy. *Val. POPLICOLA, one of the first consuls Vid. Publicola.

POPPÆA SABINA, a celebrated Roman matron, daughter of Titus Olius. She married a Roman knight called Rufus Crispinus, by whom she had a son. Her personal charms, and the elegance of her figure, captivated Otho, who was then one of Nero's favourites. He carried her away and married her; but Nero, who had seen her, and had often heard her accomplishments extolled, soon deprived him of her company, and sent him out of Italy, on pretence of presiding over one of the Roman provinces. After he had taken this step, Nero repudiated his wife Octavia, on pretence of barrenness, and married Poppæa. The cruelty and avarice of the emperor did not long permit Poppæa to share the imperial dignity, and though she had already made him father of a son, he began to despise her, and even to use her with barbarity. She died of a blow which she received from his foot when many months advanced in her pregnancy, about the sixty-fifth year of the Christian era. Her funeral was performed with great pomp and solemnity, and statues were raised to her memory. It is said that she was so anxious to preserve her beauty and the elegance of her person, that 500 asses were kept on purpose to afford her milk in which she used daily to bathe. Even in her banishment she was attended by fifty of these animals for the same purpose, and from their milk she invented a kind of ointment or pomatum, to preserve beauty, called poppæanum from her Plin. 11, 41. Sueton. in Ner. et Oth.—Tacit. 13 et 14.—A beautiful woman at the court of Nero. She was mother to the preceding. Tacit. Ann. 11, 1, &c.

POPULONIA, or Populonium, a city of Etruria, on the coast, on a line with Vetulora. It was the great naval arsenal of the Etrurians, and was destroyed in the civil wars of Sylla. Strab. 5.—Virg. Æn. 10, 172.

PORATA, a river of Dacia, rising on the eastern side of the Bastarnic Alps, and flowing with a southerly course into the Danube, near Galatz It is now the Pruth.

PORCIA, a sister of Cato of Utica, greatly commended by Cicero.—A daughter of Cato of Utica, who married Bibulus, and after his death, Brutus She was remarkable for her prudence, philosophy, courage, and conjugal tenderness. She gave herself a heavy wound in the thigh to see with what fortitude she could bear pain; and when her husband asked her the reason of it, she said that she wished to try whether she had courage enough to share not only his bed, but to partake of his most hidden secrets. Brutus was astonished at her constancy, and no longer detained from her knowledge the conspiracy which he and many other illustrious Romans had formed against Julius Cæsar Porcia wished them success, and though she betrayed fear, and fell into a swoon the day that her husband was gone to assassinate the dictator, yet she was faithful to her promise, and dropped nothing which might affect the situation of the conspirators. When Brutus was dead, she refused to survive him, and attempted to end her life as a daughter of Cato. Her friends attempted to terrify her; but when she saw that every weapon was removed from her reach, she swallowed burning coals and died, about forty-two years before the Christian era. Valerius Maximus says, that she was acquainted with her husband's conspiracy against Cæsar when she gave herself the wound. Val. Max. 3, 2 4, 6. —Plut. in Brut. &c.

PORCIA LEX, de civitate, by M Porcius the tribune, A. U. C. 453. It ordained that no magistrate should punish with death, or scourge with rods, a Roman citizen when condemned, but only permit him to go into exile. Sallust. in Cat 51. Liv. 10, 9.

PORCIUS LATRO, M. a celebrated orator who killed himself when labouring under a quartan ague, A. U. C. 750.—Licinius, a Latin poet during the time of the third Punic war, commended for the elegance, the graceful ease, and happy wit of his epigrams.—Luca, a Roman senator who joined the conspiracy of Catiline.

POREDORAX, one of the forty Gauls whom Mithridates ordered to be put to death, and to remain unburied for conspiring against him His mistress at Pergamus buried him against the orders of the monarch. Plut. de Virt Mul.

PORPHYRION, a son of Cœlus and Terra, one of the giants who made war against Jupiter. He was so formidable that Jupiter, to conquer him, inspired him with love for Juno, and while the giant endeavoured to obtain his wishes, he, with the assistance of Hercules, overpowered him. Horat. od. 3, 4.—Martial. 13, 78.—Apollod. 1, 6.

PORPHYRIUS, a celebrated Plotinian philosopher, of the Platonic school, a learned and zealous supporter of pagan theology, and an inveterate enemy to the Christian faith. He was a native of Tyre, and born A. D. 233. He was introduced at an early age to the study of literature and philosophy under the Christian Origen, while the latter was teaching at Cæsarea, in Palestine. He then went to Athens, where he cultivated rhetoric under the famous Longinus, who changed his Syriac name, which was Melek (king), into that of Porphyrius, as something synonymous and more pleasing to Grecian ears. It is chiefly owing to this able teacher that the writings of Porphyrius exhibit so many proofs of erudition and so much elegance of style. He subsequently proceeded to Rome where, at thirty years of age he heard Plotinus, under whom he studied the eclectic system for six years; and being of a melancholy temperament, was with difficulty persuaded by his master from putting an end to his existence, in order, in the spirit of the Platonic doctrine, to release his soul from its wretched prison, the body. In order to divert his melancholy he visited Sicily, and took up his abode at Lilybæum; where, according to Eusebius and Jerome, he composed those famous books against the Christians, which, by reason of his name and authority, and the acuteness and learning with which they were written, were suppressed by particular edicts, under Constantine and Theodosius. The circumstances of the life of Porphyrius are little known after his arrival in Sicily; except that he died at Rome at the end of the reign of Diocletian, about 304 A D. He wrote a great number of books, the greater part of which, in consequence of the mistaken zeal above described, have perished. From the fragments which remain, he appears to have been a writer of erudition and eloquence, neither of which can altogether atone for his mysticism, his credulity, and the very doubtful honesty of much of his fanaticism. Of his numerous works, the only pieces which have escaped the depredations of time, are his "Life of Pythagoras," a book "On the Cave of the Nymphs in the Odyssey," "Homeric Questions," a fragment "On the Styx," "An Epistle to Anebo, the Egyptian," a treatise "On the Five Predicables," commonly prefixed to the logical works of Aristotle, "Thoughts on Intelligibles," "A Treatise on Abstinence from Animal food," "A Life of Plotinus," "A Commentary on the Harmonies of Ptolemy," and a few other unimportant pieces. The best edition of the life of Pythagoras is that given by Kiessling at the end of his edition of Jamblichus' life of Pythagoras (Lips. 1818, 2 vols. 8vo.), of the Treatise on Abstinence from animal food, the best is that of Rhoer, (Lugd. Bat. 1762, 4to.) which contains also in the same volume Van Goen's edition of the work on the Cave of the Nymphs.

PORSENNA, or PORSENA, a king of Etruria, who declared war against the Romans because they refused to restore Tarquin to his throne and to his royal privileges. He was at first successful, the Romans were defeated, and Porsenna would have entered the gates of Rome, had not Cocles stood at the head of a bridge and supported the fury of the whole Etrurian army, while his companions behind were cutting off the communication with the opposite shore. This act of bravery astonished Porsenna, but when he had seen Mutius Scævola enter his camp with an intention to murder him, and when he had seen him burn his hand without emotion, to convince him of his fortitude and intrepidity, he no longer dared to make head against a people so brave and so generous. He concluded a peace with the Romans, and for ever after abandoned the cause of Tarquin. The generosity of Porsenna's behaviour to the captives was admired by the Romans, and to reward his humanity they raised a brazen statue to his honour. Liv. 2, 9, &c. — Plut. in Public. — Flor. 1, 10. — *Horat. PORTA CAPENA, a gate at Rome which leads to the Appian way. Ovid. Fast. 6 192 ——Aurelia, a gate at Rome, which received its name from Aurelius, a consul who made a road which led to Pisa, all along the coast of Etruria.——Asinaria led to mount Cœlius. It received its name from the family of the Asinii.——Carmentalis was at the foot of the capitol, built by Romulus. It was afterwards called Scelerata, because the 300 Fabii marched through when they went to fight an enemy, and were killed near the river Cremera.——Janualis was near the temple of Janus.——Esquilina was also called Metia, Tuguria, or Libitinaria and all criminals who were going to be executed generally passed through, as also dead bodies which were carried to be burned on mount Esquilinus.——Flaminia, called also Flumentana, was situate between the capitol and mount Quirinalis, and through it the Flaminian road passed.——Fontinalis led to the Campus Martius. It received its name from the great number of fountains that were near it.——Navalis was situate near the place where the ships came from Ostia.——Viminalis was near mount Viminalis.——Trigemina, called also Ostiensis, led to the town of Ostia.——Catularia was near the Carmentalis Porta, at the foot of mount Viminalis.——Collatina received its name from its leading to Collatia.——Collina, called also Quirinalis, Agonensis, and Salaria, was near Quirinalis Mons. Annibal rode up to this gate and threw a spear into the city. It is to be observed, that at the death of Romulus there were only three or four gates at Rome, but the number was increased, and in the time of Pliny there were thirty-seven, when the circumference of the walls was thirteen miles and 200 paces.

PORTUMNUS, a sea-deity. Vid. Melicerta.

PORUS, the god of plenty at Rome. He was son of Metis or Prudence. Plato in Symp.——A king of India, when Alexander invaded Asia. The conqueror of Darius ordered him to come and pay homage to him as a dependent prince. Porus scorned his commands, and declared he would go and meet him on the frontiers of his kingdom sword in hand, and immediately he marched a large army to the banks of the Hydaspes. The stream of the river was rapid; but Alexander crossed it in the obscurity of the night, and defeated one of the sons of the Indian monarch. Porus himself renewed the battle, but the valour of the Macedonians prevailed, and the Indian prince retired covered with wounds, on the back of one of his elephants. Alexander sent one of the kings of India to demand him to surrender, but Porus killed the messenger, exclaiming, Is not this the voice of the wretch who has abandoned his country and when he at last was prevailed upon to come before the conqueror, he approached him as an equal. Alexander demanded of him how he wished to be treated; like a king, replied the Indian monarch. This magnanimous answer so pleased the Macedonian conqueror, that he not only restored him his dominions, but increased his kingdom by the conquest of new provinces; and Porus, in acknowledgment of such generosity and benevolence, became one of the most faithful and attached friends of Alexander, and never violated the assurances of peace which he had given him. Porus is represented as a man of uncommon stature, great strength, and proportionable dignity. Plut. in Alex. — Philostr. 2, 10. — Curt. 8, 8, &c. — Claud. Cons. Honor. 4, 375.

POSIDES, an eunuch and freedman of the emperor Claudius, who rose to honours by the favour of his master. Jun 14, 94.

POSIDEUM, a promontory in Caria, between Miletus and the Iassian gulf. Mela, 1, 17.——A promontory of Chios, nearest the mainland of Ionia.——A promontory in the northern part of Bithynia, now Tchantsche-Aggisi, &c. The name implies a promontory sacred to Neptune (Ποσειδῶν.)

POSIDON, a name of Neptune among the Greeks, about the derivation of which the moderns are greatly divided. Some form it from ποῦς, οσίος and γῆ, because the divinity shook the earth; others from σὰλλα εἰδὼν, because the god sees many things; and others from πόσις, because Neptune is the god of water.

POSIDONIA. Vid. Pæstum.

POSIDONIUS, an astronomer and mathematician of Alexandria. He was the disciple of Zeno, and, therefore, must have lived not long after Eratosthenes. He probably flourished about 260 B. C. He employed himself in ascertaining the measure of the circumference of the earth by means of the altitude of a fixed star; and he concluded it to be 240,000 stadia, according to Cleomedes, but only 18,000 according to Strabo. He is also supposed to have been the author of a treatise on military tactics, of which Ælian speaks in the first chapter of his work on the same subject. No fragments, however, of his writings remain. Diog. Laert. 7, 1 —— A celebrated Grecian philosopher of the Stoic sect, who flourished about fifty or sixty years before Christ, was a native of Apamea in Syria. He taught philosophy at Rhodes, with such reputation, that Pompey, on his return towards Rome, after the successful termination of the war against Mithridates, came thither with the design of attending his lectures. When he came to his house, he forbad his lictor to knock at the door, but, by ordering him to lower the fasces at the gate of Posidonius, the conqueror of the eastern and western world paid respectful homage to philosophy. Being informed that he was at that time confined by an attack of the gout, Pompey visited him in his chamber, and expressed his regret that the philosopher's situation would deprive him of the pleasure of hearing his discourses. Upon this Posidonius made an effort for the gratification of his illustrious visitor, and delivered a discourse to prove that nothing would be deemed good that was not honourable. He is said to have constructed a kind of sphere, with which he exhibited the apparent motions of the sun, moon and planets round the earth. He is thought, besides, to have written a continuation of the history of Polybius in a polished and elegant style. Strab. 14 — Cic. Tusc. 5, 37.

POSTHUMIUS Albinus, a man who suffered himself to be bribed by Jugurtha, against whom he had been sent with an army Sallust. Jug 36 —— A writer at Rome, whom Cato ridiculed for composing a history in Greek, and afterwards offering apologies for the inaccuracy and inelegance of his expressions.—— Tubero, a master of horse to the dictator Æmilius Mamercus. He was himself made dictator in the war which the Romans waged against the Volsci, and he punished his son with death for fighting against his orders, A. U. C. 312 Liv. 4, 23, &c.—— Spurius a consul sent against the Samnites. He was taken in an ambush by Pontius the enemy's general, and obliged to pass under the yoke with all his army. He saved his life by a shameful treaty, and when he returned to Rome, he persuaded the Romans not to reckon as valid the engagements he had made with the enemy, as it was without their advice. He was given up to the enemy because he could not perform his engagements, but he was released by Pontius for his generous and patriotic behaviour.—— Aulus, a dictator who defeated the Latins and the Volsci. Liv. 2, 19 et 20.—— Tubertus, another dictator, who defeated the Æqui and Volsci. ——Lucius, a consul sent against the Samnites —A general who defeated the Sabines, and who was the first who obtained an ovation.—— Regillensis a general who conquered the Æqui, and who was stoned by the army, because he refused to divide the promised spoils. Liv. 4, 49 et 50.— Vop. 32.—— Lucius, a Roman consul, who was defeated by the Boii. He was left among the slain, and his head was cut off from his body, and carried in triumph by the barbarians into their temples, where they made with the skull a sacred vessel to offer libations to their gods.—— Mareus Cassius Latianus, an officer proclaimed emperor in Gaul, A. D. 260. He reigned with great popularity, and gained the affection of his subjects by his humanity and moderation. He took his son of the same name as a colleague on the throne. They were both assassinated by their soldiers, after a reign of six years.—— Megillinus, a consul against the Samnites and Tarentines.—— Albus, a Roman decemvir, sent to Athens to collect the most salutary laws of Solon, &c. Liv. 3, 31 —— Silvius, a son of Æneas and Sylvia.

POSTUMIA VIA, a Roman road about the town of Hostilia.

POSTUMIUS. Vid. Posthumius.

POTAMIDES, nymphs who presided over rivers and fountains, as their name (ποταμὸς fluvius) implies.

POTAMON, a philosopher of Alexandria, whose era is not determined. While he selected what he judged most tenable from every system, he pretended to form of these extracts a separate doctrine of his own; concerning which we have not sufficient details to enable us to judge. Diog. Laert 1, 21.

POTAMOS, a borough of Attica, connected with the tribe Leontis, where was the tomb of Ion, the son of Xanthus. Paus 1, 31.

POTHOS, one of the deities of the Samothracians. Plin. 36, 5.

POTIDÆA, a city of Macedonia, situated on the isthmus connecting the peninsula of Pallene with the mainland. It was founded by the Corinthians, from whom it was taken by the Athenians, and from the latter again by Philip, who gave it to the Olynthians. Cassander increased and beautified it, after which it was called Cassandria. It was one of the most opulent and splendid cities in Macedonia. Thucyd. 1, 56, &c. 2, 70.— Herod. 7, 123 & 127. 9, 28. - Diod. Sic. 18.

POTITIUS Vid. Pinarius.

POTNIÆ, a city of Bœotia, about ten miles to the south west of Thebes. It had a sacred grove dedicated to Ceres and Proserpine. It was here that Glaucus was said to have been torn to pieces by his infuriated mares. The site of this place corresponds nearly with that occupied by the village of Taki. Paus. 9, 8. — Strab. 9. Virg. G 3, 267.

PRÆNESTE, now Palestrina, a city of Latium, south east of Rome. Strabo makes the intervening distance twenty-five miles (200 stadia); but the Itineraries give, more correctly, twenty-three miles. Its citadel is described by Strabo as remarkable for its strength of position. It stood on the brow of a lofty hill which overhung the city, and was cut off from the prolongation of the chain by a narrow slip of inferior elevation. The origin of Præneste, like that of many of the ancient towns in Italy, is fabulous. According to some, it was founded by Cæculus, the son of Vulcan, while others ascribe it to a chief of the name of Prænestis, grandson of Ulysses and Circe Strabo, however, tells us more plainly, that it claimed a Greek origin, and had been named formerly Πολυστέφανος. We may infer from Dionysius that Præneste was afterwards colonized by Alba. It shared the fate of the other Latin towns, in becoming subject to Rome, upon the failure of the attempt made in common to assist the family of Tarquin. Subsequently we find the Prænestini oftener uniting with the Volsci and other enemies, in their attacks on Rome, than remaining firm in their allegiance to that power. They were defeated, however, by T. Quinctius Cincinnatus, near the river Allia, and eight of their towns and castles fell into the victor's hands, when they thought proper to submit. Again they revolted, and were again conquered by Camillus. Virg Æn. 678 et 682. - Strab. 5.- Dion. 1, 31.— Liv. 2, 19. 6, 27 et 29 8, 13.

PRÆTOR, one of the chief magistrates at Rome. The name of prætor was anciently common to all the magistrates. Thus the dictator is called in Livy (3, 55,) prætor maximus. But when the consuls, being engaged in almost continual wars, could not attend to the administration of justice, a magistrate was created for that purpose, A. U. C. 389, to whom the name of prætor was thenceforth appropriated. He was at first created only from among the patricians, as a kind of compensation for the consulship being communicated to the plebeians, but afterwards, A. U. C. 419, from the plebeians also. One of them was wholly employed in admin.istering justice among the citizens, whence he was called prætor urbanus; and the other appointed judges in all causes which related to foreigners, and was called prætor peregrinus. In the year of Rome 520, two more prætors were created to assist the consul in the government of the provinces of Sicily and Sardinia, which had been lately conquered, and two more when Spain was reduced into the form of a Roman province, A. U. C. 551. The prætor urbanus, and peregrinus, administered justice only in minor or private causes but in public and important causes the people either judged themselves, or appointed persons, one or more, to preside at the trial. In A. U. C. 604, it was determined that the prætor urbanus and peregrinus should continue to exercise their usual jurisdictions; and that the other four prætors should, during their magistracy, also remain in the city, and preside at public trials; one at trials concerning extortion; another concerning bribery, a third concerning crimes committed against the state; and a fourth about defrauding the public treasury. Still, however, when any thing unusual or atrocious happened, the people or senate judged about the matter themselves, or appointed inquisitors to preside at the trial, as in the case of Clodius for violating the mysteries of the Bona Dea, and of Milo for the murder of Clodius. Sylla the dictator added two more, and Julius Cæsar encreased the number to 10, and afterwards to 16, and the second triumvirate to 64 After this their numbers fluctuated, being sometimes 18, 16, or 12, till, in the decline of the empire, their dignity decreased, and their numbers were reduced to three. In his public capacity the prætor administered justice, protected the rights of widows and orphans, presided at the celebration of public festivals, and in the absence of the consul assembled or prorogued the senate as he pleased. He also exhibited shows to the people, and in the festivals of the Bona Dea, where no males were permitted to appear, his wife presided over the rest of the Roman matrons. Feasts were announced and proclaimed by him. and he had the power to make and repeal laws, if it met with the approbation of the senate and people The quæstors were subject to him, and in the absence of the consuls, he appeared at the head of the armies, and in the city he kept a register of all the freedmen of Rome, with the reasons for which they had received their freedom. In the provinces the prætors appeared with great pomp, six lictors with the fasces walked before them, and when the empire was encreased by conquest, they divided their government, like the consuls, and provinces were given them by lot. When the year of their prætorship was elapsed, they were called proprætors, if they still continued at the head of their province. At Rome the prætors appeared also with much pomp, two lictors preceded them, they wore the prætexta, or the white robe with purple borders, they sat in curule chairs, and their tribunal was distinguished by a sword and a spear while they administered justice. The tribunal was called prætorium. When they rode, they appeared on white horses at Rome, as a mark of distinction The prætors Cerealis, appointed by Julius Cæsar, were employed in providing corn and provision for the city. They were on that account often called frumentarii.

PRÆTORIA, or Augusta Prætoria, a city of Cisalpine Gaul, in the territory of the Salassi. It was built on the site occupied by the camp of Terentius Varro, when that commander was sent by Augustus to repress the plundering movements of the Salassi and to seize upon their country. Augustus honoured the rising colony by giving it the name of Augusta Prætoria. It is now known as Aoste, which gives its name to the fine valley in which it lies, and where several remains of the ancient city are still to be seen. Strab 4.

PRÆTORIUS, a name ironically applied to As. Sempronius Rufus, because he was disappointed in his solicitations for the prætorship, as being too dissolute and luxurious in his manners He was the first who had a stork brought to his table Horat Sat. 2. 2. 50.

PRATINAS, a native of Phlius, contemporary with Æschylus, and a dramatic poet of considerable talent He once obtained a tragic victory. But the superiority of Æschylus led him to contrive a novel and mixed kind of play. Borrowing from tragedy its external form and mythological materials, Pratinas added a chorus of Satyrs, with their lively songs and gestures. The new composition was called the Satyric Drama, of which he must be regarded as the inventor. He exhibited fifty dramas, of which thirty-two were satyric. Suid. in Prat. Athen. 14

PRAXAGORAS, an Athenian writer, who published a history of the kings of his own country, the life of Constantine the Great, and the life of Alexander, all now lost.

PRAXITELES, a famous sculptor of Magna Græcia, who flourished about 324 years before the Christian era. He chiefly worked on Parian marble, on account of its beautiful whiteness. He carried his art to the greatest perfection, and was so happy in copying nature, that his statues seemed to be animated. The most famous of his pieces was a Cupid, which he gave to Phryne. This celebrated courtezan, who wished to have the best of all the statues of Praxiteles, and who could not depend upon her own judgment in the choice alarmed the sculptor, by telling him his house was on fire. Praxiteles upon this showed his eagerness to save his Cupid from the flames, above all his other pieces; but Phryne restrained his fears, and by discovering her artifice, obtained the favourite statue. The sculptor employed his chisel in making a statue of this beautiful courtezan, which was dedicated in the temple of Delphi, and placed between the statues of Archidamus, king of Sparta, and Philip, king of Macedon. He also made a statue of Venus, at the request of the people of Cos, and gave them their choice of the goddess, either naked or veiled. The former was superior to the other in beauty and perfection, but the inhabitants of Cos preferred the latter. The Cnidians, who did not wish to patronise modesty and decorum with the same eagerness as the people of Cos, bought the naked Venus, and it was so universally esteemed that Nicomedes, king of Bithynia, offered the Cnidians to pay an enormous debt under which they laboured, if they would give him their favourite statue. This offer was not accepted. The famous Cupid was bought of the Thespians by Caius Cæsar, and carried to Rome, but Claudius restored it to them, and Nero afterwards obtained possession of it. Paus. 1, 40. 3, 9. – Plin 7, 34 et 36.

PRAXITHEA, a daughter of Phrasimus and Diogenea. She married Erechtheus, king of Athens, by whom she had Cecrops, Pandarus, and Metion, and four daughters, Procris, Creusa, Cithonia, and Orithyia. Apollod 3, 15

PRELIUS, or PRILIS, a lake of Etruria, on the coast, not far from which the Gauls and Gæsatæ were defeated by the Romans, B. C. 225. It is now called Lago di Castiglione. Cic. pro Mil 27.—Plin 3, 5.

PREXASPES, a Persian who put Smerdis to death by order of king Cambyses. Herod. 3, 30.

PRIAMIDES, a patronymic applied to Paris, as being son of Priam. It is also given to Hector, Deiphobus, and all the other children of the Trojan monarch. Ovid. Heroid.—Virg. Æn. 3, 235.

PRIAMUS, the last king of Troy, was son of Laomedon, by Strymo, called Placia by some When Hercules took the city of Troy [Vid Laomedon], Priam was in the number of his prisoners, but his sister Hesione redeemed him from captivity, and he exchanged his original name of Podarces, for that of Priam, which signifies bought or ransomed. [Vid. Podarces.] He was also placed on his father's throne by Hercules, and he employed himself with well directed diligence in repairing, fortifying, and embellishing, the city of Troy. He had married, by his father's orders, Arisba, whom now he divorced for Hecuba the daughter of Dimas, or Cisseus a neighbouring prince. He had by Hecuba 17 children, according to Cicero, or according to Homer, 19; the most celebrated of whom are Hector, Paris, Deiphobus, Helenus, Pammon, Polites, Antiphus, Hipponous, Troilus, Creusa, Laodice, Polyxena, and Cassandra. Besides these he had many others by concubines Their names, according to Apollodorus, are Melampus, Gorgythion, Philæmon, Glaucus, Agathon, Evagoras, Hippothous, Chersidamas, Hippodamas, Mestor, Atas, Doreylus, Dryops, Lycaon, Astygonus, Bias, Evander, Chromius, Telestas, Melius, Cebrion, Laodocus, Idomeneus, Archemachus, Echephron, Hyperion, Ascanius, Arthetus, Democoon, Dejopites, Echemon, Clovius, Ægioneus, Hyptyrchus. Lysithous, Polymedon, Medusa, Lysimache, Medesicaste, and Aristoleme. After he had reigned for some time in the greatest prosperity, Priam expressed a desire to recover his sister Hesione, whom Hercules had carried into Greece, and married to Telamon his friend. To carry this plan into execution, Priam manned a fleet, of which he gave the command to his son Paris, with orders to bring back Hesione. Paris, to whom the goddess of beauty had promised the fairest woman in the world, [Vid. Paris] neglected in some measure his father's injunctions, and as if to make reprisals upon the Greeks, he carried away Helen he wife of Menelaus, king of Sparta, during the absence of her husband. Priam beheld this with satisfaction, and he countenanced his son by receiving in his palace the wife of the king of Sparta. This rape kindled the flames of war; all the suitors of Helen, at the request of Menelaus, [Vid. Menelaus] assembled to revenge the violence offered to his bed, and a fleet according to some of 140 ships under the command of the 29 chiefs that furnished them, set sail for Troy. Priam might have averted the impending blow by the restoration of Helen; but this he refused to do, when the ambassadors of the Greeks came to him, and he immediately raised an army to defend himself. Troy was soon besieged, frequent skirmishes took place, in which the success was various, and the advantages on both sides inconsiderable. The siege was continued for ten successive years, and Priam had the misfortune to see the greatest part of his children massacred by the enemy. Hector, the eldest of these, was the only one upon whom now the Trojans looked for protection and support; but he soon fell a sacrifice to his own courage, and was killed by Achilles. Priam severely felt his loss, and as he loved him with the greatest tenderness, he wished to ransom his body, which was in the enemy's camp. The gods, according to Homer, interested themselves in favour of old Priam. Achilles was prevailed upon by his mother, the goddess Thetis, to restore Hector to Priam, and the king of Troy passed through the Grecian camp conducted by Mercury the messenger of the gods, who with his rod had made him invisible. The meeting of Priam and Achilles was solemn and affecting, the conqueror paid to the Trojan monarch that attention and reverence which was due to his dignity, his years, and his misfortunes, and Priam in a suppliant manner addressed the prince whose favours he claimed, and kissed the hands that had robbed him of the greatest and the best of his children. Achilles was moved by his tears and entreaties; he restored Hector, and permitted Priam a truce of 12 days for the funeral of his son. Some time after Troy was betrayed into the hands of the Greeks by Antenor and Æneas, and Priam upon this resolved to die in defence of his country. He put on his armour and advanced to meet the Greeks, but Hecuba by her tears and entreaties detained him near an altar of Jupiter, whither she had fled for protection While Priam yielded to the prayers of his wife, Polites, one of his sons, fled also to the altar before Neoptolemus, who pursued him with fury. Polites, wounded and overcome, fell dead at the feet of his parents, and the aged father, fired with indignation, vented the most bitter invectives against the Greek, who paid no regard to the sanctity of altars and temples, and raising his spear darted it upon him. The spear hurled by the feeble hand of Priam, touched the buckler of Neoptolemus, and fell to the ground. This irritated the son of Achilles; he seized Priam by his grey hairs, and, without compassion or reverence for the sanctity of the place, he plunged his dagger into his breast. His head was cut off, and the mutilated body was left among the heaps of slain. Dictys Cret. 2, &c.—Dares Phrygi.—Herod. 2 120.—Paus. 10, 25.—Homer Il. 22, &c.—Eurip. in Troad.—*Cic. PRIAPUS, a deity among the ancients, who presided over gardens, and the parts of generation in the sexes. He was son of Venus by Mercury or Adonis, or according to the more received opinion, by Bacchus. The goddess of beauty, who was enamoured of Bacchus, went to meet him as he returned victorious from his Indian expedition, and by him she had Priapus, who was born at Lampsacus. Priapus was so deformed in all his limbs, particularly the genitals, by means of Juno, who had assisted at the delivery of Venus, that the mother, ashamed to have given birth to such a monster, ordered him to be exposed on the mountains. His life, however, was preserved by the shepherds. He soon became a favourite of the people of Lampsacus, but he was expelled by the inhabitants on account of his immoral conduct. This violence was punished by the son of Venus, and when the Lampsacenians had been afflicted with a disease in the genitals, Priapus was recalled, and temples erected to his honour. Festivals were also celebrated, and the people, naturally idle and indolent, gave themselves up to every lasciviousness and impurity during the celebration. His worship was also introduced in Rome: but the Romans revered him more as a god of orchards and gardens, than as the patron of licentiousness. A crown painted with different colours was offered to him in the spring, and in the summer a garland of ears of corn. An ass was generally sacrificed to him. He is generally represented with a human face and the ears of a goat he holds a stick in his hand, with which he terrifies birds, as also a club to drive away thieves, and a scythe to prune the trees and cut down corn. He was crowned with the leaves of the vine, and sometimes with laurel or rocket. The last of these plants was sacred to him, as it is said to raise the passions and excite love. Catull. ep. 19 et 20.—Colum. de cult. hort. 2.—Horat. sat. 8, 1.—Tibull. 1, 1, 18.—*Ovid. According to some, it was founded by a colony from Miletus, while others ascribe it to the inhabitants of Cyzicus. The god Priapus, whom it was said a nymph had born to Bacchus, gave his name to this town, whose territory produced excellent wine, a circumstance which sufficiently accounts for the worship paid to him there. The modern name of Priapus is Karabon. Strab. 13.—Schol. Theocr. 1, 21 —— An island near Ephesus. Plin 5, 31.

PRIENE, a city of Caria, north of the mouth of the Mæander, and at the foot of mount Mycale. It was founded at first by Æpytus, son of Neleus, but received afterwards a second colony, brought by Philotas of Thebes; hence it was sometimes called Cadme. It could boast of having given birth to Bias, one of the seven sages of Greece. According to Strabo, the Prienians had the right of electing the president of the Panionian sacrifices. The remains of Priene are to be seen near the modern village of Samsoun. Strab. 14.—Herod. 1, 27 et 170

PRISCIANUS, an eminent grammarian, was a native of Cæsarea, and went to Constantinople, where he taught grammar and rhetoric with great reputation about A. D. 525. He composed various works, of which his treatise, "De Arte Grammatica" was first published by Aldus, at Venice, in 1476, from a MS. found in France. It has been reprinted frequently, but the best edition is that of Krehl, 2 vols. 8vo Lips. 1819. A translation of the Periegesis of Dionysius into Latin verse is attributed to Priscian: it has been printed with the Oxford edition of that author

PRISCUS, SERVILIUS, a dictator at Rome who defeated the Veientes and the Fidenates.——A surname of the elder Tarquin king of Rome. [Vid. Tarquinius.] —— A governor of Syria, brother to the emperor Philip. He proclaimed himself emperor in Macedonia when he was informed of his brother's death, but he was soon after conquered and put to death by Decius. Philip's murderer. ——Helvidius, a quæstor in Achaia during the reign of Nero, remarkable for his independent spirit. Tacit. Hist. 4, 6.

PRISTIS, the name of one of the ships that engaged in the naval combat which was exhibited by Æneas at the anniversary of his father's death. She was commanded by Mnestheus. Virg. Æn. 1, 116

PRIVERNUS, a Rutulian killed by Camilla in the wars between Æneas and Turnus. Virg. Æn. 9, 576.

PRIVERNUM, a city of Latium, in the territory of the Volsci, the ancient name of which is still partially lost in that of the modern Piperno, which marks its situation Virgil makes it the birth place of Camilla We have the authority of the same poet for ascribing it to the Volsci; but Strabo would seem to consider the Privernates as a distinct people from the Volsci, for he particularises them among the petty nations conquered by the Romans and incorporated in Latium. *Virg. PROBUS, M. Aurelius Severus, a native of Sirmium in Pannonia. His father was originally a gardener, who, by entering the army, rose to the rank of a military tribune. His son obtained the same office in the twenty-second year of his age, and he distinguished himself so much by his probity, his valour, his intrepidity, moderation, and clemency, that at the death of the emperor Tacitus, he was invested with the imperial purple by the voluntary and uninfluenced choice of his soldiers. His election was universally approved by the Roman senate and the people; and Probus, strengthened on his throne by the affection and attachment of his subjects, marched against the enemies of Rome, in Gaul and Germany. Several battles were fought, and after he had left 400,000 barbarians dead in the field, Probus turned his arms against the Sarmatians. The same success attended him, and after he had quelled and terrified to peace the numerous barbarians of the north he marched through Syria against the Blemmyes in the neighbourhood of Egypt. The Blemmyes were defeated with great slaughter, and the military character of the emperor was so well established, that the king of Persia sued for peace by his ambassadors, and attempted to buy the conqueror's favour with the most splendid presents. Probus was then feasting upon the most common food when the ambassadors were introduced, but without even casting his eyes upon them, he said, that if their master did not give proper satisfaction to the Romans, he would lay his territories desolate, and as naked as the crown of his head. As he spoke, the emperor took off his cap, and showed the baldness of his head to the ambassadors. The conditions were gladly accepted by the Persian monarch, and Probus retired to Rome to convince his subjects of the greatness of his conquests, and to claim from them the applause which their ancestors had given to the conqueror of Macedonia or the destroyer of Carthage, as he passed along the streets of Rome. His triumph lasted several days, and the Roman populace were long entertained with shows and combats. But the Roman empire, delivered from its foreign enemies, was torn by civil discord; and peace was not re-established till three usurpers had been severally defeated. While his subjects enjoyed tranquillity, Probus encouraged the liberal arts; he permitted the inhabitants of Gaul and Illyricum to plant vines in their territories, and he himself repaired seventy cities in different parts of the empire which had been reduced to ruins. He also attempted to drain the waters which were stagnated in the neighbourhood of Sirmium, by conveying them to the sea by artificial canals. His armies were employed in this laborious undertaking, but as they were unaccustomed to such toils they soon mutinied, and fell upon the emperor as he was passing into one of the towns of Illyricum. He fled into an iron tower which he himself had built to observe the marshes, but as he was alone, and without arms, he was soon overpowered and murdered, in the fiftieth year of his age, after a reign of six years and four months, on the second of November after Christ 282. The news of his death was received with the greatest consternation, not only his friends, but his very enemies deplored his fate, and even the army, which had been concerned in his fall, erected a monument over his body, and placed upon it this inscription. Hic Probus imperator, verè probus, situs est, victor omnium gentium barbararum victor etiam tyrannorum. He was then preparing in a few days to march against the Persians that had revolted, and his victories there might have been as great as those he obtained in the two other quarters of the globe. He was succeeded by Carus; and his family, who had shared his greatness, immediately retired from Rome, not to become objects either of private or public malice. Zos Prob - Saturn —— Æmilius, a grammarian in the age of Theodosius. The lives of excellent commanders, written by Cornelius Nepos, have been falsely attributed to him, by some authors.——An oppressive prefect of the prætorian guards, in the reign of Valentinian.

PROCAS, a king of Alba after his father Aventinus. He was father of Amulius and Numitor. Liv. 1, 3.—Ovid. Met. 14, 622.—Virg Æn 6, 767.

PROCHYTA, an island off the coast of Campania, and adjacent to Ænaria. It is said to have derived both its origin and name from a profusion of mountainous parts, upon the occasion of the island Ænaria being moved by an earthquake. Virg Æn 9. 715 - Sil. Ital. 8, 542.

PROCLES, a son of Aristodemus and Argia, born at the same birth as Eurysthenes. There were continual dissensions between the two brothers, who both sat on the Spartan throne. [Vid. Eurysthenes and Lacedæmon.]——A native of Andros in the Ægean sea, who was crowned at the Olympic games. Paus. 6, 14. ——A leader of the Ionians, claiming descent from Ion son of Xuthus. He was invited by the Samians to come with his followers, and settle in their island, which he did, and obtained the sovereignty. Paus. 7, 4.

PROCLIDÆ, the descendants of Procles, who sat on the throne of Sparta, together with the Eurysthenidæ. Vid. Lacedæmon and Eurysthenes.

PROCLUS, a Platonic philosopher, born at Constantinople, A. D. 412. He studied at Alexandria, and next at Athens, where he succeeded Syrianus in the Platonic school, and died A. D. 485. His existing works are—"Hymns to the Sun, Venus, and the Muses;" "Commentaries on Plato;" Ptolemy's "De judiciis Astrorum;" the first book of Euclid's Elements, and Hesiod's "Works and Days;" also a treatise "De Sphæra," and "Argumenta adversus Christianos."

PROCONNESUS, now Marmara, an island of the Propontis, at the north-east of Cyzicus; also called Elaphonesus and Neuris. It was much celebrated for its marble quarries, which supplied most of the public buildings in Cyzicus with their materials as also the palace of king Mausolus. The marble was white, with black streaks intermixed. Plin. 5, 32. - Strab. 13.—Vitruv. 2, 8

PROCOPIUS, a celebrated officer of a noble family in Cilicia, related to the emperor Julian, with whom he lived in great intimacy. He was universally admired for his integrity, but he was not destitute of ambition or pride. After he had signalized himself under Julian and his successor, he retired from the Roman provinces among the barbarians in the Thracian Chersonesus, and some time after he suddenly made his appearance at Constantinople, when the emperor Valens had marched into the east, and he proclaimed himself master of the eastern empire. His usurpation was universally acknowledged, and his victories were so rapid, that Valens would have resigned the imperial purple, had not his friends intervened. But now fortune changed, Procopius was defeated in Phrygia, and abandoned by his army. His head was cut off, and carried to Valentinian in Gaul, A. D 366. Procopius was slain in the forty-second year of his age, and he had usurped the title of emperor for above eight months. Ammian. Marcel. 25 et 26.——A historian of the sixth century, was born at Cæsarea in Palestine. He was a pleader of causes at Constantinople in the reign of Anastasius, who held him in great estimation, as also did the emperors Justin and Justinian. He next became secretary to Belisarius, whom he attended in his wars; after which he was admitted into the senate, and appointed prefect of Constantinople, where he died about 560. He wrote the History of his Times, particularly of the Persian war; and the wars with the Vandals and Goths; also a work on the public edifices built or restored by Justinian, and a book of Anecdotes, printed at Paris in Greek and Latin 1662, folio. It is a matter of dispute, whether Procopius was a Christian or a Pagan.

PROCRUSTES, a famous robber of Attica, killed by Theseus, near the Cephisus. He laid travellers on a bed, and if their length exceeded that of the bed, he cut off part of their limbs to make it equal, but if they were shorter he stretched their bodies till they were of the same length. He is called by some Damastes and Polypemon. Ovid. Heroid. 2, 69.—Met. 7, 43. —Plut. in Thes.

PROCULEIUS, a Roman knight, very intimate with Augustus. He is celebrated for his humanity, and fraternal kindness to his brothers Murena and Scipio, with whom he divided his possessions, after they had forfeited their estates, and incurred the displeasure of Augustus, for siding with young Pompey. He was sent by Augustus to Cleopatra, to endeavour to bring her alive into his presence, but to no purpose. He destroyed himself when labouring under a heavy disease. Horat. Od. 2, 2.—Plut in Anton. —Plin 36, 24.

PROCULUS, JULIUS, a Roman who, after the death of Romulus, declared that he had seen him in his appearance more than human, and that he had ordered him to bid the Romans to offer him sacrifices under the name of Quirinus, and to rest assured that Rome was destined by the gods to become the capital of the world. Plut. in Rom.—Liv. 1, 16.—An African in the age of Aurelius. He published a book entitled de regionibus, or religionibus, on foreign countries, &c.—An officer who proclaimed himself emperor in Gaul, in the reign of Probus. He was soon after defeated, and exposed on a gibbet. He was very debauched and licentious in his manners, and had acquired riches by piratical excursions.

PROCYON, a constellation so called from its rising just before the dog star. (Προκύων, from πρὸ ante and κύων canis) whence its Latin name of Antecanis, or Ante Canem. Cic. de Nat. D. 2, 41.—Plin. 18, 28.

PRODICUS, a sophist and rhetorician of Cos, about 396 years before Christ. He was sent as ambassador by his countrymen to Athens, where he publicly taught, and had among his pupils Euripides, Socrates, Theramenes, and Isocrates. He travelled from town to town in Greece, to procure admirers and get money. He made his auditors pay to hear him harangue, which has given occasion to some of the ancients to speak of the orations of Prodicus for fifty drachmas. In his writings, which were numerous, he composed a beautiful episode, in which virtue and pleasure were introduced, as attempting to make Hercules one of their votaries. The hero at last yielded to the charms of virtue, and rejected pleasure. This has been imitated by Lucian. Prodicus was at last put to death by the Athenians, on pretence that he corrupted the morals of their youth. Xenophon. Memor.

PROETIDES, the daughters of Proetus, king of Argolis, were three in number, Lysippe, Iphinoe, and Iphianassa. They became insane for neglecting the worship of Bacchus, or, according to others, for preferring themselves to Juno, and they ran about the fields, believing themselves to be cows, and flying away not to be harnessed to the plough or to the chariot. Proetus applied to Melampus to cure his daughters of their insanity, but he refused to employ him when he demanded a third part of his kingdom as a reward. This neglect of Proetus was punished, the insanity became contagious, and the monarch at last promised Melampus two parts of his kingdom and one of his daughters, if he would restore them and the Argian women to their senses. Melampus consented, and after he had wrought the cure, he married the most beautiful of the Proetides. Some have called them Lysippe, Iphinoe, and Cyrianassa. Apollod. 2, 2.—Virg. Ecl. 6, 48.—Ovid. Met. 15.—Lactant. ad Stat Theb 1 et 3.

PROETUS, a king of Argos, son of Abas and Ocalea. He was twin brother to Acrisius, with whom he quarrelled even before their birth. This dissension between the two brothers encreased with their years. After their father's death, they both tried to obtain the kingdom of Argos; but the claims of Acrisius prevailed, and Proetus left Peloponnesus and retired to the court of Jobates, king of Lycia, where he married Stenobœa, called by some Antea or Antiope. He afterwards returned to Argolis, and by means of his father-in-law, he made himself master of Tiryntus. Stenobœa had accompanied her husband to Greece, and she became by him mother of the Proetides, and of a son called Megapenthes, who, after his father's death, succeeded on the throne of Tiryntus. [Vid. Stenobœa.] Hom. Il. 6, 160.—Apollod. 2, 2.

PROGNE, a daughter of Pandion, king of Athens, by Zeuxippe. She married Tereus, king of Thrace, by whom she had a son called Itylus or Itys. Vid. Philomela.

PROMENEA, one of the priestesses of the temple of Dodona. It was from her that Herodotus received the tradition that two doves had flown from Thebes, in Egypt, one to Dodona, and the other to the temple of Jupiter Ammon, where they gave oracles. Herod. 2, 55.

PROMETHEUS, a son of Iapetus by Clymene, one of the Oceanides. He was brother to Atlas, Menœtius, and Epimetheus, and surpassed all mankind in cunning and fraud. He ridiculed the gods, and deceived Jupiter himself. He sacrificed two bulls, and filled their skins, one with the flesh and the other with the bones, and asked the father of the gods, which of the two he preferred as an offering. Jupiter became the dupe of his artifice, and chose the bones, and from that time the priests of the temples were ever after ordered to burn the whole victims on the altars, the flesh and the bones altogether. To punish Prometheus and the rest of mankind, Jupiter took fire away from the earth, but the son of Iapetus outwitted the father of the gods. He climbed the heavens by the assistance of Minerva, and stole fire from the chariot of the sun, which he brought down upon the earth, at the end of a ferula. This provoked Jupiter the more; he ordered Vulcan to make a woman of clay, and after he had given her life, he sent her to Prometheus, with a box of the richest and most valuable presents which she had received from the gods. [Vid. Pandora.] Prometheus, who suspected Jupiter, took no notice of Pandora or her box, but he made his brother Epimetheus marry her, and the god, now more irritated, ordered Mercury, or Vulcan, according to Æschylus, to carry this artful mortal to mount Caucasus, and there tie him to a rock, where for 30,000 years, a vulture was to feed upon his liver, which was never diminished, though continually devoured. He was delivered from this painful confinement about thirty years afterwards by Hercules, who killed the bird of prey. The vulture, or, according to others, the eagle, which devoured the liver of Prometheus, was born from Typhon and Echidna. According to Apollodorus, Prometheus made the first man and woman that ever were upon the earth with clay, which he animated by means of the fire which he had stolen from heaven. On this account, therefore, the Athenians raised him an altar in the grove of Academus, where they yearly celebrated games to his honour. During these games there was a race, and he who carried a burning torch in his hand without extinguishing it obtained the prize. Prometheus, as it is universally credited, had received the gift of prophecy; and all the gods, and even Jupiter himself, consulted him as a most infallible oracle. To him mankind are indebted for the invention of many of the useful arts; he taught them the use of plants, with their physical power, and from him they received the knowledge of taming horses and different animals, either to cultivate the ground, or for the purposes of luxury. Hesiod. Theog. 510 et 550. — Apollod. 1 et 2. — Paus. 1, 30. 5, 11. Hygin. fab. 144. — Æschyl. in Prom. — Virg. Ecl. 6, 42. — Ovid. Met. 1, 52. — Horat. od. 1, 3. — Seneca in Med. 823.

PRONAPIDES, an ancient Greek poet of Athens, who was, according to some, preceptor to Homer. It is said that he first taught the Greeks how to write from the left to the right, contrary to the custom of writing from the right to the left, which is still observed by some of the eastern nations. *Diod. PRONOMUS, a Theban who played so skilfully on the lute, that the invention of that musical instrument is attributed to him. Paus. 9, 12. — Athen. 14, 7.

PRONUBA, a surname of Juno, because she presided over marriages. Virg. Æn. 4, 164.

PROPERTIUS, Sextus Aurelius, a Roman poet, was a native of Umbria, probably of the town anciently called Mevania, now Bevagna. He flourished in the reign of Augustus, by whom, and by Mecænas, he was favoured, and whose praises are a frequent theme of his verse. In the list of Roman elegiac poets according to the order of time, Ovid places him between Tibullus and himself. Of his history little is known. His father was of the equestrian order, and lost his life at Perusia, among other partisans of Antony. The confiscation of most of his property followed; and young Propertius came to Rome, where his poetry made him advantageously known, and obtained for him the patronage of the great. The time of his death is not recorded, but it is placed by conjecture B C 10. Of this poet we have four books of elegies remaining. In this branch of composition he was an imitator of the Grecian Philetas and Callimachus, and he has always been ranked among the most eminent of the Latin elegiacs. Less natural and pathetic than Tibullus, with whom he is generally compared, he is more learned, various, and ornamented, abounding in allusions to fable and mythology. He is elegant, often ingenious, and frequently obscure. His language and versification are pure and refined. His amatory poems throughout the four books are addressed to a single object of passion, whom he calls Cynthia, the poetical name of a Roman lady named Hostia or Hostilia, and with whom his connection, if real, appears to have been of the licentious kind. The elegies of Propertius have been frequently printed, both separately and in conjunction with those of Tibullus. The best editions are those of Brouckhusius, 4to. Amst. 1727; of Vulpius, 2 vols. 4to. Patav. 1755; of Burmann, 4to. Traj. ad Rhen 1780; and of Lachmann, 8vo Lips. 1816. Ovid Trist. 2, 465. 4, 10, 53. *de Art. PROPOETIDES, some women of Cyprus, severely punished by Venus whose divinity they had despised. They sent their daughters to the sea-shore, where they prostituted themselves to strangers. The poets have feigned that they were changed into stones, on account of their insensibility to every virtuous sentiment. Justin. 18, 5. — Ovid. Met. 10, 238.

PROPONTIS, a sea between Europe and Asia, which has a communication with the Euxine by the Thracian Bosphorus, and with the Ægean by the Hellespont, now called the sea of Marmara. It is about ninety miles long, and received its name from its lying before the Pontus Euxinus (πρὸ Πόντου). Its modern appellation is derived from that of the island Proconnesus. Mela, 1, 19. — Ovid. Trist. 1, 9, 29. — Propert 3, 22.

PROSERPINA, a daughter of Ceres by Jupiter, called by the Greeks Persephone She was so beautiful, that the father of the gods himself became enamoured of her, and deceived her by changing himself into a serpent, and folding her in his wreaths. Proserpine made Sicily the place of her residence, and delighted herself with the beautiful views, the flowery meadows, and limpid streams, which surrounded the plains of Enna. In this solitary retreat, as she amused herself with her female attendants in gathering flowers, Pluto carried her away into the infernal regions, of which she became the queen. [Vid. Pluto.] Ceres was so disconsolate at the loss of her daughter, that she travelled all over the world, but her inquiries were in vain, and she never would have discovered whither she had been carried, had not she found the girdle of Proserpine on the surface of the waters of the fountain Cyane, near which the ravisher had opened himself a passage to his kingdom by striking the earth with his trident. Ceres soon learned from the nymph Arethusa that her daughter had been carried away by Pluto, and immediately she repaired to Jupiter, and demanded of him to punish the ravisher. Jupiter in vain attempted to persuade the mother, that Pluto was not unworthy of her daughter, and when he saw that she was inflexible for the restitution of Proserpine, he said that she might return on earth, if she had not taken any aliments in the infernal regions. Her return, however, was impossible. Proserpine, as she walked in the Elysian fields, had gathered a pomegranate from a tree and eaten it, and Ascalaphus was the only one who saw it, and for his discovery the goddess instantly turned him into an owl. Jupiter, to appease the resentment of Ceres, and sooth her grief, permitted that Proserpine should remain six months with Pluto in the infernal regions, and that she should spend the rest of the year with her mother on earth. As queen of hell, and wife of Pluto, Proserpine presided over the death of mankind, and, according to the opinion of the ancients, no one could die, if the goddess herself, or Atropos her minister, did not cut off one of the hairs from the head. From this superstitious belief, it was usual to cut off some of the hair of the deceased, and to strew it at the door of the house, as an offering for Proserpine. The Sicilians were very particular in their worship to Proserpine, and as they believed that the fountain Cyane had risen from the earth, at the very place where Pluto had opened himself a passage, they annually sacrificed there a bull, of which they suffered the blood to run into the water. Proserpine was universally worshipped by the ancients, and she was known by the different names of Core, Theogamia, Libitina

PROSPER, one of the fathers who died A D. 486. His works have been edited by Mangeant, fol. Paris, 1711

PROTAGORAS, a Greek philosopher, who was a disciple of Democritus. He was a native of Abdera, and is said to have been a porter before he studied philosophy, in which he however became so eminent, that he opened a school at Athens. He is principally noted on account of his having incurred the charge of atheism, from the extreme licentiousness of his public discourses; and being banished from Athens, he went to Epirus, and afterwards took a voyage to Sicily, in the course of which he died, but in what year is not known. He belonged to the Elean sect of philosophers, and he flourished B. C 423. Diog. 9 —Plut. in Protag.

PROTESILAI TURRIS, the monument of Protesilaus, on the Hellespont. Plin. 4, 11.—Mela. 2, 2.

PROTESILAUS, a king of part of Thessaly, son of Iphiclus, originally called Iolaus, grandson of Phylacus, and brother to Alcimede, the mother of Jason. He married Laodamia, the daughter of Acastus, and some time after he departed with the rest of the Greeks for the Trojan war with forty sail. He was the first of the Greeks who set foot on the Trojan shore, and as such he was doomed by the oracle to perish, therefore he was killed as soon as he had leaped from his ship, by Æneas or Hector. Homer has not mentioned the person who killed him. His wife Laodamia destroyed herself, when she heard of his death. [Vid Laodamia.] Protesilaus has received the patronymic of Phylacides, either because he was descended from Phylacus, or because he was a native of Phylace. He was buried on the Trojan shore, and, according to Pliny, there were near his tomb certain trees which grew to an extraordinary height, which as soon as they could be discovered and seen from Troy immediately withered and decayed, and afterwards grew up again to their former height, and suffered the same vicissitude. *Homer. PROTEUS, a sea deity, son of Oceanus and Tethys, or, according to some, of Neptune and Phœnice. He had received the gift of prophecy from Neptune, because he had tended the monsters of the sea, and from his knowledge of futurity, mankind received the greatest services. He usually resided in the Carpathian sea, and, like the rest of the gods, he reposed himself on the sea-shore, where such as wished to consult him generally resorted. He was difficult of access, and when consulted he refused to give answers, by immediately assuming different shapes, and if not properly secured in fetters, eluding the grasp in the form of a tiger, or a lion, or disappearing in a flame of fire, a whirlwind, or a rushing stream. Aristæus and Menelaus were in the number of those who consulted him, as also Hercules. Some suppose that he was originally a king of Egypt, known among his subjects by the name of Cetes, and they assert that he had two sons, Telegonus and Polygonus, who were both killed by Hercules. He had also some daughters, among whom were Cabira, Eidothea, and Rhetia. Homer. Od. 4, 360. —Ovid. Met. 8, fab 10. Am. 12, 36. —Virg. G. 4, 387. —Hygin. fab 118.—Herod. 2, 112.

PROTOGENES, a painter of Rhodes, who flourished about 3.8 years before Christ. He was originally so poor that he painted ships to maintain himself. His countrymen were ignorant of his ingenuity before Apelles came to Rhodes, and offered to buy all his pieces. This opened the eyes of the Rhodians, they became sensible of the merits of their countryman, and liberally rewarded him. Protogenes was employed for seven years in finishing a picture of Ialysus, a celebrated huntsman, supposed to have been the son of Apollo, and the founder of Rhodes. During all this time the painter lived only upon lupines and water, thinking that such aliments would leave him greater flights of fancy; but all this did not seem to make him more successful in the perfection of his picture. He was to represent in the piece a dog panting, and with froth at his mouth, but this he never could do with satisfaction to himself; and when all his labours seemed to be without success, he threw his sponge upon the piece in a fit of anger. Chance alone brought to perfection what the labours of art could not do, the fall of the sponge upon the picture represented the froth of the mouth of the dog in the most expressive and natural manner, and the piece was universally admired. Protogenes was very exact in his representations, and copied nature with the greatest nicety, but this was blamed as a fault by his friend Apelles. When Demetrius besieged Rhodes he refused to set fire to a part of the city which might have made him master of the whole, because he knew that Protogenes was then working in that quarter. When the town was taken, the painter was found closely employed in a garden in finishing a picture; and when the conqueror asked him, why he showed not more concern at the general calamity; he replied, that Demetrius made war against the Rhodians, and not against the fine arts. Paus. 1, 3. —Plin. 35, 10.—*Ælian. PROXENUS, a Bœotian, one of the commanders of the Greek forces in the army of Cyrus the younger. He was put to death with his fellow-commanders by Artaxerxes. Proxenus was the one who induced Xenophon to join in the expedition of Cyrus, and after the death of Proxenus, Xenophon was chosen to supply his place. Anab. 1, 1, 11. 2, 6, 1, &c.

PRUDENTIUS, AURELIUS CLEMENS, a Latin poet, who flourished about A. D 392. He was born at Calagurris (Calahorra), or, according to a less probable opinion, at Cæsaraugusta (Saragossa) He was brought up to the bar, and became chief magistrate in two considerable cities. He also served in the army, and obtained honourable employment at the court of Honorius. He was a zealous Christian, and his poetical talents were devoted to the service of his religion. His compositions are chiefly valuable as documents of Christian antiquity, for their defects of style and versification exclude them from the list of classics even of a low order. The best editions of Prudentius are, that of Weitzius, 8vo. Hanov 1613; that of Heinsius, 2 vols. 24mo. Lugd. Bat. 1667; and that of Arivalus, 4to. Romæ, 1788.

PRUSA, a town of Bithynia, at the foot of mount Olympus, and hence called Prusa ad Olympum. It was founded by Prusias, king of Bithynia, or, according to Pliny, by Hannibal. Prusa enjoyed a good government. It continued to flourish under the Roman empire; but under the Greek emperors it suffered much from the wars carried on against the Turks. It finally remained in the hands of the descendants of Osman, who made it the capital of their empire, under the corrupted name of Brusa or Brousa. It is still one of the most flourishing towns possessed by the Infidels in Anatolia. Strab. 12.—Plin 5, 32.

PRUSIAS, a king of Bithynia, who flourished 221 B. C.——Another, surnamed Venator, who made an alliance with the Romans when they waged war with Antiochus, king of Syria. He gave a kind reception to Annibal, and by his advice he made war against Eumenes, king of Pergamus, and defeated him. Eumenes, who was an ally of Rome as well as Prusias, complained before the Romans of the hostilities of the king of Bithynia. Q. Flaminius was sent from Rome to settle the disputes of the two monarchs, and he was no sooner arrived in Bithynia, than Prusias, to gain his favour, prepared to deliver to him, at his request, the celebrated Carthaginian, to whom he was indebted for all the advantages which he had obtained over Eumenes; but Annibal prevented it by a voluntary death. Prusias was obliged by the Roman ambassador to make a restitution of the provinces he had conquered, and by his meanness he continued to enjoy the favours of the Romans. When some time after he visited the capital of Italy, he appeared in the habit of a manumitted slave, calling himself the freed-man of the Romans; and when he was introduced into the senate-house, he saluted the senators by the name of visible deities, of saviours and deliverers. Such abject behaviour rendered him contemptible not only in the eyes of the Romans, but of his subjects, and when he returned home the Bithynians revolted, and placed his son Nicomedes on the throne. The banished monarch fled to Nicomedia, where he was assassinated near the altar of Jupiter, about 149 years before Christ. Some say that his son became his murderer. Prusias, according to Polybius, was the meanest of monarchs, without honesty, without morals, virtue, or principle; he was cruel and cowardly, intemperate and voluptuous, and an enemy to all learning. He was naturally deformed, and he often appeared in public in the habit of a woman, to render his deformities less visible. Polyb.—Liv.—Justin. 31, &c.—C Nep in Annib.—Plut. in Flam. &c.

PRYTANES, certain magistrates at Athens who presided over the senate, and had the privilege of assembling it when they pleased, festivals excepted. They generally met in a large hall, called prytaneum, where they gave audiences, offered sacrifices, and feasted together with all those who had rendered signal service to their country. The Prytanes were elected from the senators, which were in number 500, 50 of whom were chosen from each tribe. When they were elected, the names of the 10 tribes of Athens were thrown into one vessel, and in another were placed nine black beans and a white one. The tribe whose name was drawn with the white bean, presided the first, and the rest in the order in which they were drawn. They presided each for 35 days, as the year was divided into 10 parts; but it is unknown what tribe presided the rest of those days which were supernumerary. When the number of tribes was increased to 12, each of the Prytanes presided one full month ——Some of the principal magistrates of Corinth were also called Prytanes.

PRYTANIS, a king of Sparta, of the family of the Proclidæ. Paus. 2, 36.—— One of the friends of Æneas killed by Turnus. Virg Æn. 9, 767.

PSAMATHE, one of the Nereides, mother of Phocus by Æacus, king of Ægina. Apollod. 3, 12.—Ovid Met. 11, 398.

PSAMMENITUS, succeeded his father Amasis on the throne of Egypt. Cambyses made war against him, and as he knew that the Egyptians paid the greatest veneration to cats, the Persian monarch placed some of these animals at the head of his army, and the enemy, unable to defend themselves, and unwilling to kill those objects of adoration, were easily conquered. Psammenitus was twice beaten at Pelusium and in Memphis, and became one of the prisoners of Cambyses, who treated him with great humanity. Psammenitus however raised seditions against the Persian monarch; and attempted to make the Egyptians rebels, for which he was put to death by drinking bull's blood. He had reigned about six months. He flourished about 525 years before the Christian era. Herod. 3, 10, &c.

PSAMMETICHUS, a king of Egypt. He was one of the 12 princes who shared the kingdom among themselves; but as he was more popular than the rest, he was banished from his dominions, and retired into the marshes near the seashore. A descent of some of the Greeks upon Egypt, proved favourable to his cause; he joined the enemy, and defeated the 11 princes who had expelled him from the country. He rewarded the Greeks, by whose valour he had recovered Egypt, he allotted them some territory on the sea-coast, patronized the liberal arts, and encouraged commerce among his subjects He made useless enquiries to find the sources of the Nile, and he stopped by bribes and money, a large army of Scythians that were marching against him. He died 617 years before the Christian era, and was buried in Minerva's temple at Sais. During his reign there was a contention among some of the neighbouring nations about the antiquity of their language. Psammetichus took a part in the contest. He confided two young children and fed them with milk; the shepherd to whose care they were entrusted, was ordered never to speak to them, but to watch diligently their articulations After some time the shepherd observed, that whenever he entered the place of their confinement they repeatedly exclaimed Beccos, and he gave information of this to the monarch. Psammetichus made enquiries, and found that the word Beccos signified bread in the Phœnician language, and from that circumstance, therefore, it was universally concluded that the language of Phœnicia was of the greatest antiquity. Herod. 2, 28, &c.——A son of Gordius, brother to Periander, who held the tyranny at Corinth for three years, B. PSAMMIS, or PSAMMUTHIS, a king of Egypt, B. C. 376.

Pso, 318, a very ancient city, in the north-western part of Arcadia. It was situate at the foot of the chain of Erymanthus, from whence descended a river of the same name, which flowed near the city, and, after receiving another small stream called Aroanius, joined the Alpheus on the borders of Elis. Its remains are to be seen near the Khan of Tripotamia, so called from the junction of three rivers. Paus. 8, 24

Psyche, a nymph whom Cupid married and carried into a place of bliss, where he long enjoyed her company. Venus put her to death because she had robbed the world of her son; but Jupiter at the request of Cupid, granted Immortality to Psyche The word signifies the soul, and this personification of Psyche first mentioned by Apuleius is posterior to the Augustan age, though still it is connected with ancient mythology. Psyche is generally represented with the wings of a butterfly to intimate the lightness of the soul, of which the butterfly is the symbol, and on that account, among the ancients, when a man had just expired, a butterfly appeared fluttering above, as if rising from the mouth of the deceased.

Psylli, a people of Libya near the Syrtes, who were said to be remarkable for their power of charming serpents and of curing such as had been bitten by them. They are mentioned on this account by Lucan, in his description of the serpents which infested the army of Cato, during his march between the Syrtes, and their descendants are said to affect the same skill at the present day, although their feats in these arts are said to be capable of imitation without either danger or difficulty. They are said to have once undertaken an expedition against the South wind, because he had destroyed all their wells; but he rolled great hills of sand upon them, and having overwhelmed them, their land was seized upon by the Nasamones. The Nasamones are said by another account to have fallen suddenly upon the Psylli, and almost exterminated them, which may probably account for the preceding fable. Dio. 51, 14.—Lucan. 9, 894, 937.—Herod. 4, 173.—Paus. 9, 28.

Ptelèum, a town of Thessaly on the borders of Boeotia. Lucan. 6, 852.—Liv. 35, 43.

Pterelàus, a son of Taphius, presented with immortality by Neptune, provided he kept on his head a yellow lock. When Taphos, over which he reigned, was besieged by Amphitryon and the Teleboans, his daughter Comætho became enamoured of the general of the enemy, and cut off the fatal hair, on which depended her father's life and the prosperity and independence of her country. Her perfidy, however, was punished, and not rewarded with the expected return of love, and she was put to death by order of Amphitryon. Apollod. 2, 4.

Pteria, a small territory, forming part of Cappadocia, and in the vicinity of the city of Sinope Here the first battle took place between Croesus and Cyrus. Herod. 1. 76.

Ptolemæus, 1st, surnamed Lagus, a king of Egypt, son of Arsinoe, who, when pregnant by Philip of Macedonia married Lagus, a man of mean extraction. [Vid. Lagus.] Ptolemy was educated in the court of the king of Macedonia, he became one of the friends and associates of Alexander, and when that monarch invaded Asia, the son of Arsinoe attended him as one of his generals. During the expedition, he behaved with uncommon valour; he killed one of the Indian monarchs in single combat, and it was to his prudence and courage that Alexander was indebted for the reduction of the rock Aornus. After the conqueror's death, in the general division of the Macedonian empire, Ptolemy obtained as his share the government of Egypt, with Libya, and part of the neighbouring territories of Arabia. In this appointment the governor soon gained the esteem of the people by acts of kindness, benevolence, and clemency; and though he did not assume the title of independent monarch till 19 years after, yet he was so firmly established, that the attempts of Perdiccas to drive him away from his possessions proved abortive; and Ptolemy, after the murder of his rival by Grecian soldiers, might have added the kingdom of Macedonia to his Egyptian territories. He made himself master of Cœlosyria, Phœnicia, and the neighbouring coast of Syria, and when he had reduced Jerusalem, he carried about 100,000 prisoners to Egypt, to people the extensive city of Alexandria, which became the capital of his dominions. After he had rendered these prisoners the most attached and faithful of his subjects by his liberality and the grant of privileges, Ptolemy assumed the title of king of Egypt, and soon after reduced Cyprus under his power. He made war with success against Demetrius and Antigonus, who disputed his right to the provinces of Syria; and from the assistance he gave to the people of Rhodes against their common enemies, he received the name of Soter. While he extended his dominions, Ptolemy was not negligent of the advantages of his people. The bay of Alexandria being dangerous of access, he built a tower to conduct the sailors in the obscurity of the night, [Vid. Pharos,] and that his subjects might be acquainted with literature, he laid the foundation of a library, which, under the succeeding reigns, became the most celebrated in the world. He also established in the capital of his dominions, a society called museum, of which the members maintained at the public expense, were employed in philosophical researches, and in the advancement of science and the liberal arts. Ptolemy died in the 84th year of his age, after a reign of 39 years, about 284 years before Christ. He was succeeded by his son Ptolemy Philadelphus, who had been his partner on the throne the last ten years of his reign. Ptolemy Lagus has been commended for his abilities, not only as a sovereign, but as a writer, and among the many valuable compositions which have been lost, we are to lament a history of Alexander the Great, by the king of Egypt, greatly admired and valued for elegance and authenticity. All his successors were called Ptolemies from him Paus. 10, 7.—Justin. 13, &c.—Polyb 2.—Arrian.—Curt.—Plut. in Alex.—The 2d son of Ptolemy the first, succeeded his father on the Egyptian throne, and was called Philadelphus by antiphrasis, because he killed two of his brothers. He showed himself worthy in every respect to succeed his great father, and conscious of the advantages which arise from an alliance with powerful nations, he sent ambassadors to Italy to solicit the friendship of the Romans, whose name and military reputation had become universally known for the victories which they had just obtained over Pyrrhus and the Tarentines. His ambassadors were received with marks of the greatest attention, and immediately after four Roman senators came to Alexandria, where they gained the admiration of the monarch and of his subjects, and by refusing the crowns of gold and the rich presents which were offered to them, convinced the world of the virtue and of the disinterestedness of their nation. But while Ptolemy strengthened himself by alliances with foreign powers, the internal peace of his kingdom was disturbed by the revolt of Magas his brother, king of Cyrene. The sedition however was stopped, though kindled by Antiochus, king of Syria, and the death of the rebellious prince re-established peace for some time in the family of Philadelphus. Antiochus the Syrian king, married Berenice the daughter of Ptolemy, and the father, though old and infirm, conducted his daughter to her husband's kingdom, and assisted at the nuptials. Philadelphus died in the 61th year of his age, 246 years before the Christian era. He left two sons and a daughter, by Arsinoe, the daughter of Lysimachus. He had afterwards married his sister Arsinoe, whom he loved with uncommon tenderness, and to whose memory he began to erect a celebrated monument. [Vid Dinocrates.] During the whole of his reign, Philadelphus was employed in exciting industry, and in encouraging the liberal arts and useful knowledge among his subjects. The inhabitants of the adjacent countries were allured by promises and presents to increase the number of the Egyptian subjects, and Ptolemy could boast of reigning over 33,339 well peopled cities. He gave every possible encouragement to commerce, and by keeping two powerful fleets, one in the Mediterranean, and the other in the Red sea, he made Egypt the mart of the world. His army consisted of 200,000 foot, 40,000 horse, besides 300 elephants, and 2000 armed chariots. With justice therefore he has been called the richest of all the princes and monarchs of his age, and indeed the remark is not false when it is observed, that at his death he left in his treasury 750 000 Egyptian talents, a sum equivalent to two hundred millions sterling. His palace was the asylum of learned men whom he admired and patronized. He paid particular attention to Euclid, Theocritus, Callimachus, and Lycophron, and by increasing the library which his father had founded, he showed his taste for learning, and his wish to encourage genius. This celebrated library at his death contained 200 000 volumes of the best and choicest books, and it was afterwards increased to 700,000 volumes. Part of it was burnt by the flames of Cæsar's fleet when he set it on fire to save himself, a circumstance however not mentioned by the general, and the whole was again magnificently repaired by Cleopatra, who added to the Egyptian library that of the kings of Pergamus. It is said that the Old Testament was translated into Greek during his reign, a translation which has been called Septuagint, because translated by the labours of 70 different persons. Eutrop. Justin 17, 2, &c.—Liv.—Plut. Theocrat. Athen. 12. Plin. 13, 12.—Gellius 6, 17.——The 3d, succeeded his father Philadelphus, on the Egyptian throne. He early engaged in a war against Antiochus Theus, for his unkindness to Berenice the Egyptian king's sister whom he had married with the consent of Philadelphus. With the most rapid success he conquered Syria and Cilicia, and advanced as far as the Tigris, but a sedition at home stopped his progress, and he returned to Egypt loaded with the spoils of conquered nations. Among the immense riches which he brought, he had above 2500 statues of the Egyptian gods, which Cambyses had carried away into Persia when he conquered Egypt. These were restored to the temples, and the Egyptians called their sovereign Evergetes, in acknowledgment of his attention, beneficence, and religious zeal for the gods of his country. The last years of Ptolemy's reign were passed in peace, if we except the refusal of the Jews to pay the tribute of 20 silver talents which their ancestors had always paid to the Egyptian monarchs. He also interested himself in the affairs of Greece, and assisted Cleomenes the Spartan king against the leaders of the Achæan league; but he had the mortification to see his ally defeated, and even a fugitive in Egypt. Evergetes died 221 years before Christ, after a reign of 25 years, and like his two illustrious predecessors, he was the patron of learning, and indeed he is the last of the Lagides who gained popularity among his subjects by clemency, moderation and humanity, and who commanded respect even from his enemies, by valour, prudence, and reputation. It is said that he deposited 15 talents in the hands of the Athenians, to be permitted to translate the original manuscripts of Æschylus, Euripides, and Sophocles. Plut. in Cleom. &c.—Polyb 2.—Justin. 29 &c ——The 4th, succeeded his father Evergetes on the throne of Egypt, and received the surname of Philopater by antiphrasis, because, according to some historians, he destroyed his father by poison. He began his reign with acts of the greatest cruelty, and he successively sacrificed to his avarice his own mother, his wife, his sister, and his brother. He received the name of Typhon from his extravagance and debauchery, and that of Gallus, because he appeared in the streets of Alexandria like one of the bacchanals, and with all the gestures of the priest of Cybele. In the midst of his pleasures, Philopater was called to war against Antiochus king of Syria, and at the head of a powerful army he soon invaded his enemies' territories, and might have added the kingdom of Syria to Egypt, if he had made a prudent use of the victories which attended his arms. In his return he visited Jerusalem, but the Jews prevented him forcibly from entering their temple, for which insolence to his majesty the monarch determined to extirpate the whole nation. He ordered an immense number of Jews to be exposed in a plain, and trodden under the feet of elephants, but, by a supernatural instinct, the generous animals turned their fury not on those that had been devoted to death but upon the Egyptian spectators. This circumstance terrified Philopater, and he behaved with more than common kindness to a nation which he had so lately devoted to destruction. In the latter part of his reign, the Romans, whom a dangerous war with Carthage had weakened, but at the same time roused to superior activity, renewed, for political reasons, the treaty of alliance which had been made with the Egyptian monarchs. Philopater at last, weakened and enervated by intemperance and continual debauchery, died in the 37th year of his age, after a reign of 17 years, 204 years before the Christian era. His death was immediately followed by the murder of the companions of his voluptuousness and extravagance, and their carcasses were dragged with the greatest ignominy through the streets of Alexandria. Polyb. Justin. 30, &c.—Put in Cleom.——The 5th, succeeded his father Philopater, as king of Egypt, though only in the 4th year of his age. During the years of his minority he was under the protection of Sosibius and of Aristomenes, by whose prudent administration Antiochus was dispossessed of the provinces of Cœlosyria and Palestine, which he had conquered by war. The Romans also renewed their alliance with him after their victories over Annibal, and the conclusion of the second Punic war. This flattering embassy induced Aristomenes to offer the care of the patronage of the young monarch to the Romans, but the regent was confirmed in his honourable office, and by making a treaty of alliance with the people of Achaia, he convinced the Egyptians that he was qualified to wield the sceptre and to govern the nation. But now that Ptolemy had reached his 14th year, according to the laws and customs of Egypt, the years of his minority had expired. He received the surname of Epiphanes, or Illustrious, and was crowned at Alexandria, with the greatest solemnity, and the faithful Aristomenes resigned into his hands an empire which he had governed with honour to himself, and with credit to his sovereign. Young Ptolemy was no sooner delivered from the shackles of a superior, than he betrayed the same vices which had characterized his father; the counsels of Aristomenes were despised, and the minister who for ten years had governed the kingdom with equity and moderation, was sacrificed to the caprice of the sovereign who abhorred him for the salutary advice which his own vicious inclinations did not permit him to follow. His cruelties raised seditions among his subjects, but these were twice quelled by the prudence and the moderation of one Polycrates, the most faithful of his corrupt ministers. In the midst of his extravagance. Epiphanes did not forget his alliance with the Romans; above all others he showed himself eager to cultivate friendship with a nation from whom he could derive so many advantages, and during their war against Antiochus he offered to assist them with money against a monarch whose daughter Cleopatra he had married, but whom he hated on account of the seditions he raised in the very heart of Egypt. After a reign of 21 years, 180 years before Christ, Ptolemy was poisoned by his ministers, whom he had threatened to rob of their possessions, to carry on a war against Seleucus king of Syria. Liv 35. 13, &c. Justin. &c.——The 6th, succeeded his father Epiphanes, on the Egyptian throne, and received the surname of Philometor, on account of his hatred against his mother Cleopatra. He was in the 6th year of his age when he ascended the throne, and during his minority the kingdom was governed by his mother, and at her death by a eunuch, who was one of his favourites. He made war against Antiochus Epiphanes, king of Syria, to recover the provinces of Palestine and Cœlosyria, which were part of the Egyptian dominions, and after several successes he fell into the hands of his enemy, who detained him in confinement. During the captivity of Philometor, the Egyptians raised to the throne his younger brother Ptolemy Evergetes, or Physcon, also son of Epiphanes, but he was no sooner established in his power, than Antiochus turned his arms against Egypt, drove away the usurper, and restored Philometor to all his rights and privileges as king of Egypt. This artful behaviour of Antiochus was soon comprehended by Philometor, and when he saw that Pelusium, the key of Egypt, had remained in the hands of his Syrian ally, he recalled his brother Physcon, and made him partner on the throne, and concerted with him how to repel their common enemy. This union of interest in the two royal brothers incensed Antiochus; he entered Egypt with a large army, but the Romans checked his progress and obliged him to retire. No sooner were they delivered from the impending war, than Philometor and Physcon, whom the fear of danger had united, began with mutual jealousy to oppose each other's views. Physcon was at last banished by the superior power of his brother, and as he could find no support in Egypt, he immediately repaired to Rome. To excite more effectually the compassion of the Romans, and to gain their assistance, he appeared in the meanest dress, and took his residence in the most obscure corner of the city. He received an audience from the senate, and the Romans settled the dispute between the two royal brothers, by making them independent of one another, and giving the government of Libya and Cyrene to Physcon, and confirming Philometor in the possession of Egypt, and the island of Cyprus. These terms of accommodation were gladly accepted, but Physcon soon claimed the dominion of Cyprus, and in this he was supported by the Romans, who wished to aggrandize themselves by the diminution of the Egyptian power. Philometor refused to deliver up the island of Cyprus, and to call away his brother's attention, he fomented the seeds of rebellion in Cyrene. But the death of Philometor, 146 years before the Christian era, left Physcon master of Egypt and all the dependent provinces. Philometor has been commended by some historians for his clemency and moderation, Diod.—Liv.—Polyb.——The 7th Ptolemy, surnamed Physcon, on account of the prominence of his belly, ascended the throne of Egypt after the death of his brother Philometor, and as he had reigned for some time conjointly with him [Vid Ptolemæus 6th], his succession was approved, though the wife and the son of the deceased monarch laid claim to the crown. Cleopatra was supported in her claims by the Jews, and it was at last agreed, that Physcon should marry the queen, and that her son should succeed on the throne at his death. The nuptials were accordingly celebrated, but on that very day the tyrant murdered Cleopatra's son in her arms. He ordered himself to be called Evergetes, but the Alexandrians refused to do it, and stigmatized him with the appellation of Kakergetes, or evil doer, a surname which he deserved by his tyranny and oppression. A series of barbarity rendered him odious, but as no one attempted to rid Egypt of his tyranny, the Alexandrians abandoned their habitations and fled from a place which continually streamed with the blood of their massacred fellow citizens. If their migration proved fatal to the commerce and prosperity of Alexandria, it was of the most essential service to the countries where they retired; and the numbers of Egyptians that sought a safer asylum in Greece and Asia, introduced among the inhabitants of those countries the different professions that were practised with success in the capital of Egypt. Physcon endeavoured to re-people the city which his cruelty had laid desolate; but the fear of sharing the fate of the former inhabitants, prevailed more than the promise of riches, rights, and immunities. The king at last disgusted with Cleopatra, repudiated her, and married her daughter by Philometor, called also Cleopatra. He still continued to exercise the greatest cruelty upon his subjects; but the prudence and vigilance of his ministers kept the people in tranquillity, till all Egypt revolted when the king had basely murdered all the young men of Alexandria. Without friends or support in Egypt he fled to Cyprus, and Cleopatra the divorced queen ascended the throne. In his banishment Physcon dreaded lest the Alexandrians should also place the crown on the head of his son, by his sister Cleopatra, who was then governor of Cyrene, and under these apprehensions, he sent for the young prince, called Memphitis, to Cyprus, and murdered him as soon as he reached the shore. To make the barbarity more complete he sent the limbs of Memphitis to Cleopatra, and they were received as the queen was going to celebrate her birth-day. Soon after this he invaded Egypt with an army, and obtained a victory over the forces of Cleopatra, who, being left without friends or assistance, fled to her eldest daughter Cleopatra, who had married Demetrius king of Syria. This decisive blow restored Physcon to his throne, where he continued to reign for a considerable time, hated and despised by his subjects, and feared by his enemies. He died at Alexandria in the sixty-seventh year of his age, after a reign of twenty nine years, about 116 years before Christ. Some authors have extolled Physcon for his fondness for literature; they have observed, that from his extensive knowledge he was called the philologist, and that he wrote a comment upon Homer, besides a history in twenty four books, admired for its elegance, and often quoted by succeeding authors whose pen was employed on the same subject. Diod.—Justin 38, &c.—Athen. 2.—Porphyr.——The 8th, surnamed Lathyrus, from an excrescence like a pea on the nose, succeeded his father Physcon as king of Egypt. He had no sooner ascended the throne, than his mother Cleopatra, who reigned conjointly with him, expelled him to Cyprus; and placed the crown on the head of his brother Ptolemy Alexander, her favourite son. Lathyrus, banished from Egypt, became king of Cyprus; and soon after he appeared at the head of a large army, to make war against Alexander Jannæus, king of Judæa, through whose assistance and intrigue he had been expelled by Cleopatra. The Jewish monarch was conquered, and 50,000 of his men were left on the field of battle. Lathyrus, after he had exercised the greatest cruelty upon the Jews, and made vain attempts to recover the kingdom of Egypt, retired to Cyprus till the death of his brother Alexander restored him to his native dominions. Some of the cities of Egypt refused to acknowledge him as their sovereign; and Thebes, for its obstinacy, was closely besieged for three successive years, and from a powerful and populous city, it was reduced to ruins. In the latter part of his reign Lathyrus was called upon to assist the Romans with a navy for the conquest of Athens; but Lucullus, who had been sent to obtain the wanted supply, though received with kingly honours, was dismissed with evasive and unsatisfactory answers, and the monarch refused to part with troops which he deemed necessary to preserve the peace of his kingdom. Lathyrus died eighty-one years before the Christian era, after a reign of thirty-six years since the death of his father Physcon, eleven of which he had passed with his mother Cleopatra on the Egyptian throne, eighteen in Cyprus, and seven after his mother's death. He was succeeded by his only daughter Cleopatra, whom Alexander, the son of Ptolemy Alexander, by means of the dictator Sylla, soon after married and murdered. Joseph. Hist.—Justin 39.—Plut. in Lur.—Appian. in Mithrid.——The 9th. [Vid Alexander Ptolemy 1st; for the 10th Ptolemy, vid. Alexander Ptolemy 2d;—for the 11th, vid. Alexander Ptolemy 3d.]——The 12th, the illegitimate son of Lathyrus, ascended the throne of Egypt at the death of Alexander 3d. He received the surname of Auletes, because he played skilfully on the flute. His rise showed great marks of prudence and circumspection; and as his predecessor by his will had left the kingdom of Egypt to the Romans, Auletes knew that he could not be firmly established on his throne, without the approbation of the Roman senate. He was successful in his applications, and Cæsar, who was then consul, and in want of money, established his succession, and granted him the alliance of the Romans after he had received the enormous sum of about a million and 162,500l. sterling. But these measures rendered him unpopular at home, and when he had suffered the Romans quietly to take possession of Cyprus, the Egyptians revolted, and Auletes was obliged to fly from his kingdom, and seek protection among the most powerful of his allies. His complaints were heard at Rome, at first with indifference, and the murder of 100 noblemen of Alexandria, whom the Egyptians had sent to justify their proceedings before the Roman senate, rendered him unpopular and suspected. Pompey however, supported his cause, and the senators decreed to establish Auletes on his throne; but as they proceeded slowly in the execution of their plans, the monarch retired from Rome to Ephesus, where he lay concealed for some time in the temple of Diana. During his absence from Alexandria, his daughter Berenice had made herself absolute, and established herself on the throne by a marriage with Archelaus, a priest of Bellona's temple at Comana; but she was soon driven from Egypt, when Gabinius, at the head of a Roman army, approached to replace Auletes on his throne. Auletes was no sooner restored to power, than he sacrificed to his ambition his daughter Berenice, and behaved with the greatest ingratitude and perfidy to Rabirius, a Roman who had supplied him with money when expelled from his kingdom. Auletes died four years after his restoration, about fifty-one years before the Christian era. He left two sons and two daughters; and by his will ordered the eldest of his sons to marry the eldest of his sisters, and to ascend with her the vacant throne. As these children were young, the dying monarch recommended them to the protection and paternal care of the Romans, and accordingly Pompey the Greek was appointed by the senate to be their patron and their guardian. Their reign was as turbulent as that of their predecessors, and it is remarkable for no uncommon events, only we may observe that the young queen was the Cleopatra who soon after became so celebrated as being the mistress of J. Cæsar, the wife of M Antony, and the last of the Egyptian monarchs of the family of Lagus. Cic pro Rabir.—Strab. 17.—Dion. 39. —Appian. de Civ.—The thirteenth, surnamed Dionysus or Bacchus, ascended the throne of Egypt conjointly with his sister Cleopatra, whom he had married, according to the directions of his father Auletes. He was under the care and protection of Pompey the Great, [Vid. Ptolemæus 12,] but the wickedness and avarice of his ministers soon obliged him to reign independent. He was then in the thirteenth year of his age, when his guardian after the fatal battle of Pharsalia, came to the shores of Egypt, and claimed his protection. He refused to grant the required assistance, and by the advice of his ministers he basely murdered Pompey, after he had brought him to shore under the mask of friendship and cordiality. To curry the favour of the conqueror of Pharsalia, Ptolemy cut off the head of Pompey; but Cæsar turned with indignation from such perfidy, and when he arrived at Alexandria, he found the king of Egypt as faithless to his cause as to that of his fallen enemy. Cæsar sat as judge to hear the various claims of the brother and sister to the throne; and to satisfy the people, he ordered the will of Auletes to be read, and confirmed Ptolemy and Cleopatra in the possession of Egypt, and appointed the two younger children masters of the island of Cyprus. This fair and candid decision might have left no room for dissatisfaction, but Ptolemy was governed by cruel and avaricious ministers, and therefore he refused to acknowledge Cæsar as a judge or a mediator. The Roman enforced his authority by arms, and three victories were obtained over the Egyptian forces. Ptolemy, who had been for some time a prisoner in the hands of Cæsar, now headed his armies; but a defeat was fatal, and as he attempted to save his life by flight, he was drowned in the Nile, about forty-six years before Christ, and three years and eight months after the death of Auletes. Cleopatra, at the death of her brother, became sole mistress of Egypt; but as the Egyptians were no friends to female government, Cæsar obliged her to marry her younger brother Ptolemy, who was then in the eleventh year of his age. Appian. Civ.—Cæs. in Alex.—Strab. 17. —Joseph. Ant. — Dio. — Plut. in Ant, &c.—Sueton in Cæs.——Apion, king of Cyrene, was the illegitimate son of Ptolemy Physcon. After a reign of twenty years he died; and as he had no children, he made the Romans heirs of his dominions. The Romans presented his subjects with their independence. Liv. 70.——Ceraunus, a son of Ptolemy Soter, by Eurydice the daughter of Antipater. Unable to succeed to the throne of Egypt, Ceraunus fled to the court of Seleucus, where he was received with friendly marks of attention. Seleucus was then king of Macedonia, an empire which he had lately acquired by the death of Lysimachus in a battle in Phrygia; but his reign was short, and Ceraunus perfidiously murdered him and ascended his throne, 280 B. C. The murderer, however, could not be firmly established in Macedonia, as long as Arsinoe the widow, and the children of Lysimachus were alive, and entitled to claim his kingdom as the lawful possession of their father. To remove these obstacles, Ceraunus made offers of marriage to Arsinoe, who was his own sister. The queen at first refused, but the protestations and solemn promises of the usurper at last prevailed upon her to consent. The nuptials, however, were no sooner celebrated, than Ceraunus murdered the two young princes, and confirmed his usurpation by rapine and cruelty. But now three powerful princes claimed the kingdom of Macedonia as their own; Antiochus, the son of Seleucus; Antigonus, thy son of Demetrius; and Pyrrhus, the king of Epirus. These enemies, however, were soon removed; Ceraunus conquered Antigonus in the field of battle, and stopped the hostilities of his two other rivals by promises and money. He did not long remain inactive; a barbarian army of Gauls claimed a tribute from him, the monarch immediately marched to meet th in the field. The battle was long and bloody The Macedonians might have obtained the victory, if Ceraunus had shown more prudence. He was thrown down from his elephant, and taken prisoner by the enemy, who immediately tore his body to pieces. Ptolemy had been king of Macedonia only eighteen months. Justin. 24, &c.—Paus. 10. 10 ——An illegitimate son of Ptolemy Lathyrus, king of Cyprus, of which he was tyrannically dispossessed by the Romans. Cato was at the head of the forces which were sent against Ptolemy by the senate, and the Roman general proposed to the monarch to retire from the throne, and to pass the rest of his days in the obscure office of high priest in the temple of Venus at Paphos. This offer was rejected with the indignation which it merited, and the monarch poisoned himself at the approach of the enemy. The treasures found in the island amounted to the enormous sum of 1,356,250l sterling, which were carried to Rome by the conquerors. Plut. in Cat.—Val. Max. 9. ——A son of Pyrrhus king of Epirus, by Antigone, the daughter of Berenice He was left governor of Epirus, when Pyrrhus went to Italy to assist the Tarentines against the Romans, where he presided with great prudence and moderation. He was killed, bravely fighting in the expedition which Pyrrhus undertook against Sparta and Argos. ——An eunuch, by whose friendly assistance Mithridates the Great saved his life after a battle with Lucullus.——A king of Chalcidice in Syria, about thirty years before Christ. He opposed Pompey when he invaded Syria, but he was defeated in the attempt, and the conqueror spared his life only upon receiving 1000 talents. Joseph. Ant. 13.——A nephew of Antigonus who commanded an army in the Peloponnesus. He revolted from his uncle to Cassander, and some time after he attempted to bribe the soldiers of Ptolemy Lagus, king of Egypt, who had invited him to his camp. He was seized and imprisoned for his treachery. and the Egyptian monarch at last ordered him to drink hemlock.——A son of Juba, made king of Mauritania. He was son of Cleopatra Selene, the daughter of M. Antony, and the celebrated Cleopatra. He was put to death by Caius Caligula. Dio.—Tacit. Ann. 11.——Claudius, a celebrated Egyptian geographer, astronomer, and mathematician, was born at Pelusium, about

A. D. 70. He taught astronomy at Alexandria, where he flourished under the reign of the emperors Marcus Antoninus and Adrian. He has always been regarded as the prince of astronomers among the ancients, and in his works he has left us a complete body of the science. He corrected Hipparchus's catalogue of the fixed stars, and formed tables, by which the motions of the sun, moon, and planets, might be calculated and regulated. He digested the observations of the ancients into a system entitled Μεγάλη Σύνταξις, or Great Construction. In this work he has adopted and exhibited the ancient system of the world, which placed the earth in the centre of the universe, and this has been called, after him, the Ptolemaic system, to distinguish it from those of Copernicus and Tycho Brahe. By order of the kings of Arabia, in 827, this work was translated into Arabic, in which language it was styled Almagest, and from the Arabic it was translated into Latin, about the year 1230. The best and most useful edition is that of Halma, 2 vols. 4to. Paris. Another important work of Ptolemy was his Γεωγραφική Ἀφήγησις, ('Geographical Narration,' or "System of Geography;") in which he informs us that he followed the geography of Marinus of Tyre, but with numerous additions and corrections. Ptolemy was the first who carried into full execution and practice the invention of Hipparchus, for designating the situation of places by latitude and longitude, after it had lain dormant for more than 250 years; and though, for want of observations, it is far from being perfect, yet his work has been found very useful to modern geographers. The best edition is that of Bertius, fol. Amst. 1618. There are other works of Ptolemy still extant, particularly one entitled Ἁρμονικὰ. ("Elements of Harmony") in three books. He has the merit of having reduced the thirteen or fifteen tones of the ancients to seven. It is generally supposed also that he determined the true relations of certain intervals, and thus rendered the diatonic octave more conformable to harmony. The best edition is that of Wallis, 4to Oxon. 1682.——A native of Ascalon, who followed the profession of a grammarian at Rome, before the time of Herodian, by whom he is cited. He wrote a work on Synonyms, Περὶ διαφορᾶς λέξεων, ("On the difference of words") it is properly the fragment merely of a larger work that has reached us.——Surnamed Chennus, flourished under the emperors Trajan and Adrian. Photius has preserved for us some fragments of his work, Περὶ τῆς εἰς πολυμαθίαν καινῆς ἱστορίας ("New history of varied erudition,") in seven books.

PTOLEMAÏS, a seaport town of Phœnicia Vid. Ace. — A city on the coast of Cyrenaica in Africa, now Tolometa. It was originally merely the harbour of Barce, but was afterwards raised by the Egyptian kings to the rank of a city, and became more important than any other in the province.——Hermii, a city of Egypt, in the northern part of Thebais, north-east of Abydus. It was built by one of the Ptolemies. It rose in importance as Abydus declined, and eventually rivalled Memphis in size. Its ruins are to be seen near the modern village of Menshieh.——Theron or Ferarum, a city of Æthiopia, on the western coast of the Sinus Arabicus, founded by the Egyptians during the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus, in consequence of the proximity of an extensive wood, from which they were desirous of obtaining good materials for ship-building. It derived its name from the number of wild elephants with which the country abounded, and which the Egyptians hunted for the sake of taming and using them in battle.

PUBLICŎLA, a surname given to Publius Valerius, on account of his protecting the rights of the people, (populum colo, colis, Popliccla, Publicola.) Plut. in Pub. Liv. 2 8

PUBLILIA LEX, a law proposed by Publilius the Dictator, A. U. C. 414, ordaining, that before the people gave their votes, the senate should authorize whatever they might determine. Liv. 8, 12.——A law ordaining the plebeian magistrates should be created of the comitia Tributa Liv. 2 56

PUBLIUS SYRUS, a celebrated composer of the dramatic pieces called Mimes, was a native of Syria, and was brought while young, in the condition of a slave, to the Roman capital. He had the good fortune to fall into the hands of a kind master, who gave him an education, and afterwards liberated him. He became distinguished in the time of Julius Cæsar; and after the death of Laberius, succeeded him with still greater applause on the mimetic theatre. His writings were in high estimation, and obtained the praise of Julius Cæsar, of Cassius Severus, and of Seneca. There remain of them only fragments in the writings of Macrobius and A. Gellius, which are moral sentences, many of them of considerable beauty, and which have been admired by the moderns as well as by the ancients. They have been published along with the fragments of Laberius and other writers, and illustrated by the notes of various critics. The most useful edition is that of Gruter, 8vo. Lugd. Bat. 1727.

PUBLIUS, a prænomen common among the Romans.——Calus, a man who conspired with Brutus against Julius Cæsar.——A prætor who conquered Palæopolis. He was only a plebeian, and though neither consul nor dictator, he obtained a triumph in spite of the opposition of the senators. He was the first who was honoured with a triumph during a prætorship.——A Roman consul who defeated the Latins, and was made dictator.——A Roman flatterer in the court of Tiberius.

PULCHERIA, a daughter of the emperor Theodosius the Great, famous for her piety, moderation, and virtues.——A daughter of Arcadius, who held the government of the Roman empire for many years. She was mother of Valentinian. Her piety, and her private as well as public virtues have been universally admired. She died A. D. 452. and was interred at Ravenna, where her tomb is still to be seen.——A sister of Theodosius.

PUNICUM BELLUM The first Punic war was undertaken by the Romans against Carthage, B. C. 264. The ambition of Rome was the origin of this war. For upwards of 240 years, the two nations had beheld with secret jealousy each other's power, but they had totally eradicated every cause of contention, by settling, in three different treaties the boundaries of their respective territories, the number of their allies, and how far one nation might sail in the Mediterranean without giving offence to the other. Sicily, an island of the highest consequence to the Carthaginians as a commercial nation, was the first of the first dissensions. The Mamertini, a body of Italian mercenaries, were appointed by the king of Syracuse to guard the town of Messana, but this tumultuous tribe, instead of protecting the citizens, basely massacred them, and seized their possessions. This act of cruelty raised the indignation of all the Sicilians, and Hiero, king of Syracuse, who had employed them, prepared to punish their perfidy; and the Mamertini, besieged in Messana, and without friends or resources, resolved to throw themselves for protection into the hands of the first power that could relieve them. They were, however, divided in their sentiments, and while some implored the assistance of Carthage, others called upon the Romans for protection. Without hesitation or delay, the Carthaginians entered Messana, and the Romans also hastened to give to the Mamertini that aid which had been claimed from them with as much eagerness as from the Carthaginians. At the approach of the Roman troops, the Mamertini, who had implored their assistance, took up arms, and forced the Carthaginians to evacuate Messana. Fresh forces were poured in on every side, and though Carthage seemed superior in arms, and in resources, yet the valour and intrepidity of the Romans daily appeared more formidable, and Hiero, the Syracusan king who hitherto had embraced the interest of the Carthaginians, became the most faithful ally of the republic From a private quarrel the war became general. The Romans obtained a victory in Sicily, but as their enemies were masters at sea, the advantages which they gained were small and inconsiderable. To make themselves equal to their adversaries, they aspired to the dominion of the sea, and in sixty days timber was cut down, and a fleet of 120 galleys completely manned and provisioned. The successes they met with at sea were trivial, and little advantage could be gained over an enemy that were sailors by actual practice and long experience. Duilius at last obtained a victory, and he was the first Roman who ever received a triumph after a naval battle. The losses which they had already sustained induced the Carthaginians to sue for peace, and the Romans whom an unsuccessful descent upon Africa, under Regulus, (Vid. Regulus,) had rendered diffident, listened to the proposal, and the first Punic war was concluded B. C. 241, on the following terms:—The Carthaginians pledged themselves to pay to the Romans, within twenty years the sum of 3000 Eubœic talents; they promised to release all the Roman captives without ransom, to evacuate Sicily, and the other islands in the Mediterranean, and not to molest Hiero, king of Syracuse, or his allies. After this treaty, the Carthaginians, who had lost the dominion of Sardinia and Sicily, made new conquests in Spain, and soon began to repair their losses by industry and labour. They planted colonies, and secretly prepared to revenge themselves upon their powerful rivals. The Romans were not insensible of their successes in Spain, and to stop their progress towards Italy, they made stipulations with the Carthaginians, by which they were not permitted to cross the Iberus, or to molest the cities of their allies the Saguntines. This was for some time observed, but when Annibal succeeded to the command of the Carthaginian armies in Spain, he spurned the boundaries which the jealousy of Rome had set to his arms, and he immediately formed the siege of Saguntum The Romans were apprised of the hostilities which had been begun against their allies, but Saguntum was in the hands of the enemy before they had taken any steps to oppose him. Complaints were carried to Carthage, and war was determined on by the influence of Annibal in the Carthaginian senate. Without delay or diffidence, B. C 218, Annibal marched a numerous army of 90 000 foot and 12,000 horse, towards Italy, resolved to carry on the war to the gates of Rome He crossed the Rhone, the Alps, and the Apennines, with uncommon celerity, and the Roman consuls who were stationed to stop his progress, were severally defeated. The battles of Trebia, of Ticinus, and of the lake of Thrasymenus, threw Rome into the greatest apprehensions, but the prudence and the dilatory measures of the dictator Fabius, soon taught them to hope for better times. Yet the conduct of Fabius was universally censured as cowardice, and the two consuls who succeeded him in the command, by pursuing a different plan of operations, soon brought on a decisive action at Cannæ, in which 45,000 Romans were left in the field of battle. This bloody victory caused so much consternation at Rome, that some authors have declared that if Annibal had immediately marched from the plains of Cannæ to the city, he would have met with no resistance, but would have terminated a long and dangerous war with glory to himself, and the most inestimable advantages to his country. This celebrated victory at Cannæ left the conqueror master of two camps, and of an immense booty; and the cities which had hitherto observed a neutrality, no sooner saw the defeat of the Romans, than they eagerly embraced the interest of Carthage. The news of this victory was carried to Carthage by Mago, and the Carthaginians refused to believe it till three bushels of golden rings were spread before them, which had been taken from the Roman knights in the field of battle. After this Annibal called his brother Asdrubal from Spain with a large reinforcement, but the march of Asdrubal was intercepted by the Romans, his army was defeated, and himself slain Affairs now had taken a different turn, and Marcellus who had the command of the Roman legions in Italy, soon taught his countrymen that Annibal was not invincible in the field. In different parts of the world the Romans were making very rapid conquests, and if the sudden arrival of a Carthaginian army in Italy at first raised fears and apprehensions, they were soon enabled to dispute with their enemies for the sovereignty of Spain, and the dominion of the sea. Annibal no longer appeared formidable in Italy; if he conquered towns in Campania or Magna Græcia, he remained master of them only while his army hovered in the neighbourhood, and if he marched towards Rome the alarm he occasioned was but momentary, the Romans were prepared to oppose him, and his retreat was therefore the more dishonourable. The conquests of young Scipio in Spain had now raised the expectations of the Romans, and he had no sooner returned to Rome than he proposed to remove Annibal from the capital of Italy by carrying the war to the gates of Carthage. This was a bold and hazardous enterprize, but though Fabius opposed it, it was universally approved by the Roman senate, and young Scipio was empowered to sail to Africa,

The conquests of the young Roman were as rapid in Africa as in Spain, and the Carthaginians, apprehensive for the fate of their capital, recalled Annibal from Italy, and preferred their safety at home, to the maintaining of a long and expensive war in another quarter of the globe. Annibal received their orders with indignation, and with tears in his eyes he left Italy, where for 16 years he had known no superior in the field of battle. At his arrival in Africa, the Carthaginian general soon collected a large army, and met his exulting adversary in the plains of Zama. The battle was long and bloody, and though one nation fought for glory, and the other for the dearer sake of liberty, the Romans obtained the victory, and Annibal, who had sworn eternal enmity to the gods of Rome, fled from Carthage after he had advised his countrymen to accept the terms of the conqueror. This battle of Zama was decisive, the Carthaginians sued for peace, which the haughty conquerors granted with difficulty. The conditions were these: Carthage was permitted to hold all the possessions which she had in Africa before the war, and to be governed by her own laws and institutions. She was ordered to make restitution of all the ships and other effects which had been taken in violation of a truce that had been agreed upon by both nations. She was to surrender the whole of her fleet, except 10 galleys, she was to release and deliver up all the captives, deserters, or fugitives, taken or received during the war; to indemnify Masinissa for all the losses which he had sustained, to deliver up all her elephants, and for the future never more to tame or break any more of there animals. She was not to make war upon any nation whatever without the consent of the Romans, and she was to reimburse the Romans to pay the sum of 10,000 talents, at the rate of 200 talents a year for fifty years, and she was to give up hostages from the noblest families for the performance of these several articles; and till the ratification of the treaty, to supply the Roman forces with money and provisions. These humiliating conditions were accepted 201 B. C. and immediately 4000 Roman captives were released, five hundred galleys were delivered and burnt on the spot but the immediate exaction of 200 talents was more severely felt, and many of the Carthaginian senators burst into tears. During the 50 years which followed the conclusion of the second Punic war, the Carthaginians were employed in repairing their losses by unwearied application and industry; but they found still in the Romans a jealous rival, and a haughty conqueror, and in Masinissa, the ally of Rome, an intriguing and ambitious monarch. The king of Numidia made himself master of one of their provinces; but as they were unable to make war without the consent of Rome, the Carthaginians sought relief by embassies, and made continual complaints in the Roman senate of the tyranny and oppression of Masinissa. Commissioners were appointed to examine the cause of their complaints; but as Masinissa was the ally of Rome, the interest of the Carthaginians was neglected, and whatever seemed to depress their republic, was agreeable to the Romans. Cato, who was in the number of the commissioners, examined the capital of Africa with a jealous eye; he saw it with concern, rising as it were from its ruins; and when he returned to Rome he declared in full senate, that the peace of Italy would never be established while Carthage was in being. The senators, however, were not guided by his opinion, and the delenda est Carthago of Cato did not prevent the Romans from acting with moderation. But while the senate were debating about the existence of Carthage, and while they considered it as a dependent power, and not as an ally, the wrongs of Africa were without redress, and Masinissa, continued his depredations. Upon this the Carthaginians resolved to do their cause that justice which the Romans had denied them; they entered the field against the Numidians, but they were defeated in a bloody battle by Masinissa, who was then 90 years old. In this bold measure they had broken the peace; and as their late defeat had rendered them desperate, they hastened with all possible speed to the capital of Italy to justify their proceedings, and to implore the forgiveness of the Roman senate. The news of Masinissa's victory had already reached Italy, and immediately some forces were sent to Sicily, and from thence ordered to pass into Africa. The ambassadors of Carthage received evasive and unsatisfactory answers from the senate; and when they saw the Romans landed at Utica, they resolved to purchase peace by the most submissive terms which even the most abject slaves could offer. The Romans acted with the deepest policy, no declaration of war had been made, though hostilities appeared inevitable; and in answer to the submissive offers of Carthage the consuls replied, that to prevent every cause of quarrel, the Carthaginians must deliver into their hands 300 hostages, all children of senators, and of the most noble and respectable families. The demand was great and alarming, but was no sooner granted, than the Romans made another demand, and the Carthaginians were told that peace could not continue, if they refused to deliver up all their ships, their arms, engines of war, with all their naval and military stores. The Carthaginians complied, and immediately 40,000 suits of armour, 20,000 large engines of war, with a plentiful store of ammunition and missile weapons were surrendered. After this duplicity had succeeded, the Romans laid open the final resolutions of the senate, and the Carthaginians were then told that, to avoid hostilities, they must leave their ancient habitations and retire into the inland parts of Africa, and found another city at the distance of not less than ten miles from the sea. This was heard with horror and indignation; the Romans were fixed and inexorable, and Carthage was filled with tears and lamentations. But the spirit of liberty and independence was not yet extinguished in the capital of Africa, and the Carthaginians determined to sacrifice their lives for the protection of their gods, the tombs of their forefathers, and the place which had given them birth. Before the Roman army approached the city, preparations to support a siege were made, and the ramparts of Carthage were covered with stones, to compensate for the weapons and instruments of war which they had ignorantly betrayed to the duplicity of their enemies. Asdrubal, whom the despair of his countrymen had banished on account of the unsuccessful expedition against Masinissa, was immediately recalled; and, in the moment of danger, Carthage seemed to have possessed more spirit and more vigour, than when Annibal was victorious at the gates of Rome. The town was blocked up by the Romans, and a regular siege begun. Two years were spent in useless operations, and Carthage seemed still able to rise from its ruins, to dispute for the empire of the world; when Scipio, the descendant of the great Scipio, who finished the second Punic war, was sent to conduct the siege. The vigour of his operations soon baffled the efforts, and the bold resistance of the besieged, the communications which they had with the land were cut off, and the city which was twenty miles in circumference, was completely surrounded on all sides by the enemy. Despair and famine now raged in the city, and Scipio gained access to the city walls, where the battlements were low and unguarded. His entrance into the streets was disputed with uncommon fury, the houses as he advanced were set on fire to stop his progress; but when a body of 50,000 persons of either sex, had claimed quarter, the rest of the inhabitants were disheartened, and such as disdained to be prisoners of war, perished in the flames, which gradually destroyed their habitations, 147 B. C., after a continuation of hostilities for three years. During seventeen days Carthage was in flames; and the soldiers were permitted to redeem from the fire whatever possession they could. But while others profited from the destruction of Carthage, the philosophic general, struck by the melancholy aspect of the scene, repeated two lines from Homer, which contained a prophecy concerning the fall of Troy. He was asked by the historian Polybius, to what he then applied his prediction? To my country, replied Scipio, for her too I dread the vicissitude of human affairs, and in her turn she may exhibit another flaming Carthage. This remarkable event happened about the year of Rome 606. The news of this victory caused the greatest rejoicings at Rome, and immediately commissioners were appointed by the Roman senate, not only to raze the walls of Carthage, but even to demolish and burn the very materials with which they were made: and in a few days, that city which had been once the seat of commerce, the model of magnificence, the common store of the wealth of nations, and one of the most powerful states of the world, left behind no traces of its splendour, of its power, or even of its existence. Polyb. Oros. — Appian. de Punic &c. Flor. — Plut in Cat. &c. Strab. Liv. Epit. Dod.

PUPIENUS, Marcus Claudius Maximus, a man of an obscure family, who raised himself by his merit to the highest offices in the Roman armies, and gradually became a prætor, consul, prefect of Rome, and a governor of the provinces. His father was a blacksmith. After the death of the Gordians, Pupienus was elected with Balbinus to the imperial throne, and to rid the world of the usurpation and tyranny of the Maximini, he immediately marched against these tyrants; but he was soon informed that they had been sacrificed to the fury and resentment of their own soldiers, and therefore he returned to Rome to enjoy the tranquility which his merit claimed. He soon after prepared to make war against the Persians, who insulted the majesty of Rome, but in this he was prevented, and massacred A. D 236 by the prætorian guards. Balbinus shared his fate. Pupienus is sometimes called Maximus. In his private character he appeared always grave and serious, he was the constant friend of justice, moderation and clemency, and no greater encomium can be passed upon his virtues, than to say that he was invested with the purple without soliciting for it, and that the Roman senate and that they had selected him from thousands because they knew no person more worthy or better qualified to support the dignity of an emperor.

PUPPIUS a tragic poet in the age of Julius Cæsar. His tragedies were so pathetic, that when they were represented on the Roman stage, the audiences melted into tears, from which circumstance Horace calls them lacrymosi, ep 1, 1, 67.

PURPURARIÆ INSULÆ, two islands of the Atlantic, on the African coast, now called the Salvage Isles.

PUTEOLI, a city of Campania, now Pozzuoli, on the coast, and not far from the Lucrine lake. Its Greek name was Dicæarchia, but when the Romans sent a colony there, they gave it the name of Puteoli, probably from the number of its wells, or perhaps from the stench which was emitted by the sulphureous and aluminous springs in the neighbourhood. Respecting the origin of this place, we learn from Strabo that it was at first the harbour of Cumæ. Hence we may fairly regard it as a colony of that city, without calling in the Samians to assist in its foundation, as Steph Byz reports, and Hieronymus. The Romans appear to have first directed their attention to this spot in the second Punic war, when Fabius the consul was ordered to fortify and garrison the town, which had only been frequented hitherto for commercial purposes. In the following year it was attacked by Hannibal without success; and about this time became a naval station of considerable importance, armies were sent to Spain from thence, and the enterprising from Carthage, which was sent to sue for peace at the close of the second Punic war, disembarked here, and proceeded to Rome by land, as did St Paul about 250 years afterwards. The apostle remained seven days at Puteoli, before he set forward on his journey by the Appian Way. In the time of Strabo, the city appears to have been a place of very great commerce, and particularly connected with Alexandria, the imports from that city, which was then the emporium of the east, being much greater than the exports of Italy. Str b 5 et 17.— Plin 31, 2.— Luc 24, 7 et 13. 26. 17 30. 22. — Act Apost 28, 13.

PUTICULÆ, a place at Rome in the vicinity of the Esquiline. The Campus Esquilinus was, in the early days of Rome, without the walls of the city, and a number of pits were dug in it to receive the dead bodies of the lower orders. These holes were called puticuli, from their resemblance to wells, or more probably from the stench which issued from them in consequence of this practice. The Esquiliæ seem to have been considered as unwholesome, till this mode of burial was discontinued; which change took place in the reign of Augustus, when the gardens of Mæcenas were laid out here. Hor. Sat. 1, 8, 8. Ep. 5, 101. Varro, L. L. 4, 5.

PYANEPSIA, an Athenian festival, celebrated in honour of Theseus and his companions, who, after their return from Crete, were entertained with all manner of fruits, and particularly pulse.

From this circumstance the Pyanepsia was ever after commemorated by the boiling of pulse, διὰ τὸ ἑψεῖν ὄσπρια. Some, however, suppose that it was observed in commemoration of the Heraclidæ, who were entertained with pulse by the Athenians.

PYDNA, a city of Macedonia, on the western coast of the Sinus Thermaicus, above Dium. It is famous for the decisive victory gained in its neighbourhood, B. C. 168, by L. Æmilius over the Macedonian army under Perseus, which put an end to that celebrated empire. It is also remarkable as the place where Olympias, the mother of Alexander the Great, was besieged and put to death by Cassander. Its modern name is Kidros. Thucyd. 1, 61 et 137. — Diod. Sic. 18.

PYGMÆI, a nation of dwarfs in the extremest parts of India who spoke the same language as the other Indians, but were so small that the tallest amongst them seldom exceeded two feet in height. Some of them were said to build their houses with egg shells, whilst others lived in holes under the earth, whence they came out in harvest-time with hatchets to cut down the corn, as if to fell a forest. They were admirable archers, for which reason the king of India kept 3000 of them as guards. Their animals were all of a proportionable stature with themselves, and upon these they went out to make war against certain birds, called cranes, who came annually from Scythia to plunder them. They were once governed by a princess, named Gerana, who was changed into a crane for boasting herself fairer than Juno. Later traditions however, remove these Pygmies to the deserts of Africa, where they represent them to have attacked Hercules when sleeping after his victory over Antæus, they discharged their arrows with great fury upon the arms and legs of the hero, who, being effectually roused was so pleased with their intrepidity, that he wrapped a number of them in the skin of the Nemæan lion and carried them to Eurystheus. Ovid. Met 6, 90. — Homer. Il 3, 6. — Arist Anim. 8 12. — Juv 13, 166. — Mela, 3, 8. — Suet. in Aug. 84.

PYGMALION, a king of Tyre, son of Belus, and brother to the celebrated Dido, who founded Carthage. At the death of his father, he ascended the vacant throne, and soon became odious by his cruelty and avarice. He sacrificed every thing to the gratification of his predominant passions and he did not even spare the life of Sichæus, Dido's husband, because he was the most powerful and opulent of all the Phœnicians. This murder he committed in a temple, of which Sichæus was the priest; but instead of obtaining the riches which he desired, Pygmalion was shunned by his subjects, and Dido to avoid further acts of cruelty, fled away with her husband's treasures, and a large colony to the coast of Africa, where she founded a city Pygmalion died in the fifty-sixth year of his age, and in the forty-seventh of his reign. Virg. Æn. 1, 347, &c. — Justin 18, 5 — Apollod. 3 Fab 1.——A celebrated statuary of the island of Cyprus. The debauchery of the females of Amathus, to which he was a witness, created in him such an aversion for the fair sex, that he resolved never to marry. The affection which he had denied to the other sex, he liberally bestowed upon the works of his own hands. He became enamoured of a beautiful statue of marble which he had made, and at his earnest request and prayers, according to the mythologists, the goddess of beauty changed the favourite statue into a woman, whom the artist married, and by whom he had a son called Paphus who founded the city of that name in Cyprus. Ovid. Met 10, 9.

PYLADES, a son of Strophius, king of Phocis, by one of the sisters of Agamemnon. He was educated, together with his cousin Orestes, with whom he formed the most inviolable friendship, and whom he assisted to revenge the murder of Agamemnon, by assassinating Clytemnestra and Ægysthus. He also accompanied him to Taurica Chersonesus, and for his services Orestes rewarded him, by giving him his sister Electra in marriage. Pylades had by her two sons, Medon and Strophius. The friendship of Orestes and Pylades became proverbial. [Vid. Orestes.] Eurip. in Iphig.—Æschyl. in Ag. &c. — A celebrated Greek musician, in the age of Philopœmen. Plut. in Phil ——A celebrated actor in the reign of Augustus, banished by that emperor, for pointing with his finger to one of the audience, who had hissed him, and thus making him known to all. Suet. in Octav. 45.

PYLÆ, a general name among the Greeks for any narrow pass. The most remarkable were the following. Pylæ Albaniæ. [Vid. Caucasus.] —Pylæ Amanicæ, a pass through the range of mount Amanus, between Cilicia Campestris and Syria. Darius marched through this pass to the battle-field of Issus. Quint. Curt 3, 4 — Plin. 5, 27 — Pylæ Caspiæ. [Vid. Caspiæ Portæ.]—Pylæ Caucasiæ. [Vid. Caucasus.]—Pylæ Ciliciæ a pass of Cilicia, in the range of mount Taurus, through which flows the river Sarus. Plin. 5, 27.——Pylæ Sarmaticæ. [Vid. Caucasus.]—Pylæ Syriæ, a pass leading from Cilicia into Syria, and bounded on the one side by the sea. Xen. Anab. 1, 4. — Arrian. Exp. Alex. 2, 5.

PYLAGORÆ, a name given to the Amphictyonic council, because they always assembled at Pylæ, near the temple of Delphi.

PYLARTES, a Trojan killed by Patroclus. Homer. Il. 16, 695.

PYLAS, a king of Megara. He had the misfortune accidentally to kill his uncle Bias, for which he fled away, leaving his kingdom to Pandion, his son-in law, who had been driven from Athens. Apollod 3, 15.—Paus. 1, 39.

PYLOS, an ancient city of Elis, about eighty stadia to the east of the city of Elis, and which contended with two other towns of the same name for the honour of being the capital of Nestor's dominions. It was situated at the foot of mount Pholoe, now Mauroboumi, and between the heads of the rivers Peneus and Selleis. Hom Il. 5, 546 — Strab. 8.——A city of Elis, in the district of Tryphylia, regarded by many as Nestor's capital. It stood at a distance of thirty stadia from the coast and near a small river once called Amathus and Pamisus, but subsequently Mamusus and Arcadicus. Its vestiges are thought to correspond with a Palaio Castro situated at Paskine or Paschini, about two miles from the coast. Strab. 8 — A city of Messenia, on the western coast, off which lay the island of Sphacteria. It was situated at the foot of mount Ægaleus, now Geranio or Agio Elia. It was built by Pylas, son of Cleson, and was accounted by some the royal residence of Nestor, whose house and tomb were both shown there. Its haven, which was more frequented than any other in Messenia, was the scene of a severe contest between the fleets of Athens and Sparta. The maritime situation of this Pylos accords better with Homer's description of the Nelean city, than either the Pylos of Triphylia or Elis, but the point is one of some uncertainty. Strab. 8.—Thucyd. 4, 3.—Hom. Il. 9, 153 Od. 3, 1.

PYRA, a part of mount Œta, on which the body of Hercules was burnt. Liv. 36, 30

PYRACMON, one of Vulcan's workmen in the forges of mount Ætna The name is derived from two Greek words, which signify fire and an anvil (πυρ, ἄκμων.) Virg Æn 8, 12)

PYRAMIDS famous monuments of Egypt, now called by the Arabs Gebel Pharaon or Pharaoh's Mountains. They commence immediately southof Cairo, but on the opposite side of the Nile, and extend in an uninterrupted range for many miles in a southerly direction parallel with the banks of the river. They are many in number, and two of them were reckoned amongst the Seven wonders of the world: they were intended as sepulchres for the kings and great people of Egypt, and were of such high antiquity, that even Diodorus Siculus, who flourished forty-four years before the Christian era, has recorded that at his time neither natives nor foreigners were able to ascertain their age. The first and largest of these pyramids, said to have been built by the profligate king Cheops, was a work of twenty years, and employed 370,000 men; it was of a square form each side being 800 Greek feet long and as many in height, the stones were very skilfully cemented, and were never less than thirty feet long. It had several subterraneous chambers, and a channel for the admission of the Nile which flowed round a little island, wherein the body of Cheops was said to be deposited Close by the great pyramid was the enormous statue of a Sphinx cut out of a solid rock with great ingenuity; its height from the stomach to the top of the head was sixty-three feet, and its length 113 feet, and it was said that king Amasis was buried in it PYRAMUS, a youth of Babylon, who became enamoured of Thisbe, a beautiful virgin, who dwelt in the neighbourhood The flame was mutual, and the two lovers, whom their parents forbad to marry, regularly received each other's addresses through the chink of a wall, which separated their houses. After the most solemn vows of sincerity they both agreed to elude the vigilance of their friends, and to meet one another at the tomb of Ninus, under a white mulberry-tree, without the walls of Babylon. Thisbe came first to the appointed place, but the sudden arrival of a lioness frightened her away; and as she fled into a neighbouring cave she dropped her veil, which the lioness found and besmeared with blood. Pyramus soon arrived; he found Thisbe's veil all bloody, and concluding that she had been torn to pieces by the wild beasts of the place, he stabbed himself with his sword Thisbe, when her fears were vanished, returned from the cave, and at the sight of the dying Pyramus, she fell upon the sword which still reeked with his blood. This tragical scene happened under a white mulberry-tree, which, as the poets mention, was stained with the blood of the lovers, and ever after bore fruit of the colour of blood Ovid Met. 4. 55, &c.—Hygin. fab. 243 ——A river of Cilicia Campestris, rising in mount Taurus, and falling into the Sinus Issicus. It is now the Gihoon.

PYRENÆI, a well known range of mountains, separating Gallia from Hispania The name was commonly supposed to be derived from the Greek term πυρ, 'fire,' and various explanations were attempted to be given of this etymology According to some, these mountains had once been devastated by fire, an opinion which Posidonius deemed not improbable. The true derivation, however, is evidently the Celtic Pyren or Pyrn, "a high mountain," and from this same may in like manner be deduced the name of mount Brenner in the Tyrol, that of Pyern, in upper Austria, that of Pernec, in the Tyrol, and many others. The range of the Pyrenees is about 991 miles in length. These mountains are so steep and difficult of access, that five narrow passes only are frequented from France to Spain. The first is at St Sebastian in Biscay, the second at Maya and Pampeluna in Navarre; the third at Turiffe, the fourth from Commange into Arragon; and the last from Languedoc to Catalonia A few more have been attempted in cases of extreme necessity.

PYRENÆUS, a king of Thrace, who, during a shower of rain, gave shelter in his house to the nine muses, and attempted to offer them violence, The goddesses upon this took to their wings and flew away. Pyrenæus, who attempted to follow them, as if he had wings threw himself down from the top of a tower and was killed. Ovid. Met 5, 274.

PYRENE, a daughter of Hebrycius king of the southern parts of Spain. Hercules offered violence to her before he went to attack Geryon, and she brought into the world a serpent, which so terrified her, that she fled into the woods, where she was torn to pieces by wild beasts. Sil. Ital. 3, 420.

PYRGO, the nurse of Priam's children who followed Æneas in his flight from Troy. Virg. Æn 5, 645.

PYRGOTELES, a celebrated engraver on gems in the age of Alexander the Great. He had the exclusive privilege of engraving the conqueror, as Lysippus was the only sculptor who was permitted to make statues of him. Plin. 37, 1.

PYRIDES, a son of Celus, said to be the first who discovered and applied to human purposes the fire concealed in flints. Plin. 7, 56.

PYRRHA, a daughter of Epimetheus and Pandora, who married Deucalion, the son of Prometheus, who reigned in Thessaly. In her age all mankind were destroyed by a deluge, and she alone, with her husband, escaped from the general destruction by saving themselves in a boat which Deucalion had made by his father's advice. When the waters had retired from the surface of the earth, Pyrrha, with her husband, went to the oracle of Themis, where they were directed, to repair the loss of mankind, to throw stones behind their backs. They obeyed, and the stones which Pyrrha threw were changed into women, and those of Deucalion into men. (Vid. Deucalion.) Pyrrha became mother of Amphictyon, Hellen, and Protogenes, by Deucalion. Ovid. Met. 1, 350, &c.—Hygin. fab. 153.—Apollon. Rhod. 3, 1065.——The name which Achilles bore when he disguised himself in women's clothes, at the court of Lycomedes. Hygin fab. 96.——A promontory of Thessaly, on the western coast of the Sinus Pagasæus, and a short distance below Demetrias. It is now cape Ankistri ——A rock, with another in its vicinity named Deucalion, near the promontory mentioned in the preceding paragraph. Strab 9.

PYRRHIAS, a boatman of Ithaca, remarkable for his humanity. He delivered from slavery an old man who had been taken by pirates, and robbed of some pots full of pitch. The old man was so grateful for his kindness, that he gave the pots to his deliverer, after he had told him that they contained gold under the pitch. Pyrrhias, upon this, offered the sacrifice of a bull to the old man, and retained him in his house, with every act of kindness and attention, till the time of his death Plut in quest G—— A general of the Ætolians, defeated by Philip, king of Macedonia.

PYRRHICHA, a kind of dance said to be invented and introduced into Greece by Pyrrhus the son of Achilles, or by the Corybantes or Dactyli. The dancers were generally armed, and they exhibited at the sound of the flute, all the evolutions of military discipline Xenoph. Cyr. 6 —Dionys. Hal. 2. — Suet in Cæs 39. Ner. 12.

PYRRHIDÆ, a patronymic given to the successors of Neoptolemus in Epirus.

PYRRHO, a celebrated Greek philosopher, born at Elea, in Peloponnesus, who in early life studied painting, but aspiring to philosophical pursuits he became a disciple of Anaxarchus, and accompanied him as far as India. In this journey he followed Alexander the Great; and hence we may know in what time he flourished In India he conversed with the Brachmans and Gymnosophists, imbibing from their doctrine whatever might seem favourable to his natural disposition towards doubting; a disposition which was cherished by his master, who had formerly been a disciple of a sceptical philosopher, Metrodorus of Chios. As he was involved in fresh uncertainty by every advance he made in the study of philosophy, he left the school of the Dogmatists, who professed to be possessed of certain knowledge, and established a new school, in which he taught, that every object of human inquiry is involved in uncertainty, so that it is impossible ever to arrive at the knowledge of truth. Some have said, that this philosopher acted upon his own principles, and carried his scepticism to an extreme so ridiculous, that his friends were obliged to accompany him wherever he went, that he might not be run over by carriages, or fall down precipices. These reports, however, are inconsistent with the respect that is paid to him by ancient writers, and with the general history of his life, and are charged, as calumnies, upon the Dogmatists, whom he opposed. A great part of his life was spent in solitude; and he always preserved a settled composure of countenance, undisturbed by fear, or joy, or grief. He endured bodily pain with great fortitude; and in the midst of dangers he manifested no signs of apprehension. As a disputant, he was celebrated for the subtlety of his arguments, and the perspicuity of his language. So highly was Pyrrho esteemed by his countrymen, that they honoured him with the office of chief priest, and from respect to him, passed a decree by which all philosophers were indulged with an exemption from public taxes. Of the poets, and particularly of Homer, he was a great admirer; and frequently repeated passages from his poems. He flourished about B. C. 340, and died about the ninetieth year of his age, probably about B C 268. After his death, the Athenians honoured his memory with a statue; and a monument was erected to him in his own country. Diog. Laert. 58, &c.

PYRRHUS, a son of Achilles and Deidamia, the daughter of king Lycomedes, who received this name from the yellowness of his hair. He was also called Neoptolemus, or new warrior, because he came to the Trojan war in the last year of the celebrated siege of the capital of Troas. [Vid Neoptolemus.]—— A king of Epirus, descended from Achilles, by the side of his mother, and from Hercules, by that of his father, and son of Æacides and Phthia He was saved when an infant, by the fidelity of his servants, from the pursuits of the enemies of his father, who had been banished from his kingdom, and he was carried to the court of Glaucias king of Illyricum, who educated him with great tenderness Cassander, king of Macedonia, wished to dispatch him, as he had so much to dread from him; but Glaucias not only refused to deliver him up into the hands of his enemy, but he even went with an army and placed him on the throne of Epirus, though only 12 years of age. About five years after, the absence of Pyrrhus to attend the nuptials of one of the daughters of Glaucias, raised new commotions. The monarch was expelled from his throne by Neoptolemus, who had usurped it after the death of Æacides; and being still without resources, he applied to his brother-in law Demetrius for assistance. He accompanied Demetrius at the battle of Ipsus, and fought there with all the prudence and intrepidity of an experienced general. He afterwards passed into Egypt, where by his marriage with Antigone the daughter of Berenice, he soon obtained a sufficient force to attempt the recovery of his throne. He was successful in the undertaking, but to remove all causes of quarrel, he took the usurper to share with him the royalty, and some time after he put him to death under pretence that he had attempted to poison him. In the subsequent years of his reign, Pyrrhus engaged in the quarrels which disturbed the peace of the Macedonian monarchy; he marched against Demetrius, and gave the Macedonian soldiers fresh proofs of his valour and activity. By dissimulation he ingratiated himself in the minds of his enemy's subjects, and when Demetrius laboured under a momentary illness, Pyrrhus made an attempt upon the crown of Macedonia which, if not then successful, soon after rendered him master of the kingdom. This he shared with Lysimachus for seven months, till the jealousy of the Macedonians, and the ambition of his colleague, obliged him to retire Pyrrhus was meditating new conquests, when the Tarentines invited him to Italy to assist them against the encroaching power of Rome. He gladly accepted the invitation, but his passage across the Adriatic proved nearly fatal, and he reached the shores of Italy, after the loss of the greatest part of his troops in a storm. At his entrance into Tarentum, B. C. 280, he began to reform the manners of the inhabitants, and by introducing the strictest discipline among their troops, to accustom them to bear fatigue and to despise dangers. In the first battle which he fought with the Romans, he obtained the victory, but for this he was more particularly indebted to his elephants, whose bulk and uncommon appearance astonished the Romans and terrified their cavalry. The number of the slain was equal on both sides, and the conqueror said that such another victory would totally ruin him. He also sent Cineas, his chief minister, to Rome, and though victorious, he sued for peace. These offers of peace were refused and when Pyrrhus questioned Cineas, about the manners and the character of the Romans, the sagacious minister replied, that their senate was a venerable assembly of kings, and that to fight against them, was to attack another Hydra. A second battle was fought near Asculum, but the slaughter was so great, and the valour so conspicuous on both sides, that the Romans and their enemies reciprocally claimed the victory as their own. Pyrrhus still continued the war in favour of the Tarentines, when he was invited into Sicily by the inhabitants who laboured under the yoke of Carthage, and the cruelty of their own petty tyrants. His fondness of novelty soon determined him to quit Italy he left a garrison at Tarentum, and crossed over to Sicily, where he obtained two victories over the Carthaginians, and took many of their towns. He was for a while successful, and formed the project of invading Africa, but soon his popularity vanished, his troops became insolent, and he behaved with haughtiness, and showed himself oppressive, so that his return to Italy was deemed a fortunate event for all Sicily. He had no sooner arrived at Tarentum than he renewed hostilities with the Romans with great acrimony, but when his army of 80,000 men had been defeated by 20,000 of the enemy, under Curius, he left Italy with precipitation, B. C. 274, ashamed of the enterprize, and mortified by the victories which had been obtained over one of the descendants of Achilles. In Epirus he began to repair his military character by attacking Antigonus, who was then on the Macedonian throne. He gained some advantages over his enemy, and was at last restored to the throne of Macedonia. He afterwards marched against Sparta, at the request of Cleonymus, but when all his vigorous operations were insufficient to take the capital of Laconia, he retired to Argos where the treachery of Aristeus invited him. The Argives desired him to retire and not to interfere in the affairs of their republic, which were confounded by the ambition of two of their nobles. He complied with their wishes, but in the night he marched his forces into the town and might have made himself master of the place had he not retarded his progress by entering it with his elephants. The combat that ensued was obstinate and bloody, and the monarch, to fight with more boldness, and to encounter dangers with more facility, exchanged his dress. He was attacked by one of the enemy, but as he was going to run him through in his own defence, the mother of the Argive, who saw her son's danger from the top of a house, threw down a tile and brought Pyrrhus to the ground. His head was cut off, and carried to Antigonus, who gave his remains a magnificent funeral, and presented his ashes to his son Helenus, 272 years before the Christian era. Pyrrhus has been deservedly commended for his talents as a general; and not only his friends, but also his enemies, have been warm in extolling him; and Annibal declared, that for experience and sagacity the king of Epirus was the first of commanders. He had chosen Alexander the Great for a model, and in every thing he wished not only to imitate, but to surpass him. In the art of war none was superior to him, he not only made it his study as a general, but even he wrote many books on encampments, and the different ways of training up an army, and whatever he did was by principle and rule. His uncommon understanding, and his penetration, are also admired; but the general is severely censured, when has no sooner conquered a country, than he looks for other victories, without regarding or securing what he has already obtained. His measures and regulations honourable to himself and advantageous to his subjects. The Romans passed great encomiums upon him, and Pyrrhus was no less struck with their magnanimity and valour; so much indeed, that he exclaimed that if he had soldiers like the Romans, or if the Romans had him for a general, he would leave no corner of the earth unseen, and no nation unconquered. Pyrrhus married many wives and all for political reasons; besides Antigone, he had Lanassa the daughter of Agathocles, as also a daughter of Autoleon king of Paonia His children, as his biographer observes, derived a warlike spirit from their father, and when he was asked by one to which of them he should leave the kingdom of Epirus, he replied, to him who has the sharpest sword. *Elian. PYTHAGÓRAS, a celebrated philosopher, born at Samos. His father Mnesarchus was a person of distinction, and, therefore, the son received that education which was most calculated to enlighten his mind and invigorate his body Like his contemporaries he was early made acquainted with poetry and music, eloquence and astronomy became his private studies, and in gymnastic exercises he often bore the palm for strength and dexterity. He first made himself known in Greece, at the Olympic games, where he obtained, in the 18th year of his age, the prize for wrestling; and, after he had been admired for the elegance and the dignity of his person, and the brilliancy of his understanding, he retired into the east. In Egypt and Chaldæa he gained the confidence of the priests, and learned from them the artful policy, and the symbolic writings, by which they governed the prince as well as the people, and, after he had spent many years in gathering all the information which could be collected from antique tradition concerning the nature of the gods and the immortality of the soul, Pythagoras revisited his native island. The tyranny of Polycrates at Samos disgusted the philosopher, who was a great advocate for national independence; and though he was the favourite of the tyrant, he retired from the island, and a second time assisted at the Olympic games. His fame was too well known to escape notice; he was saluted in the public assembly by the name of Sophist, or wise man, but he refused the appellation, and was satisfied with that of philosopher, or, the friend of wisdom. "At the Olympic games," said he, in explanation of this new appellation he wished to assume, "some are attracted with the desire of obtaining crowns and honours, others come to expose their different commodities to sale, while curiosity draws a third class, and the desire of contemplating whatever deserves notice in that celebrated assembly; thus on the more extensive theatre of the world, while many struggle for the glory of a name, and many pant for the advantages of fortune, a few, and indeed but a few who are neither desirous of money nor ambitious of fame, are sufficiently gratified to be spectators of the wonder, the hurry, and the magnificence of the scene." From Olympia, the philosopher visited the republics of Elis and Sparta, and retired to Magna Græcia, where he fixed his habitation in the town of Crotona, about the fortieth year of his age. Here he founded a sect which has received the name of the Italian, and he soon saw himself surrounded by a great number of pupils which the recommendation of his mental, as well as his personal accomplishments had procured. His skill in music and medicine, and his knowledge of mathematics and of natural philosophy, gained him friends and admirers, and amidst the voluptuousness which prevailed among the inhabitants of Crotona, the Samian sage found his instructions respected, and his approbation courted, the most debauched and effeminate were pleased with the eloquence and the graceful delivery of the philosopher, who boldly upbraided them for their vices, and called them to more virtuous and manly pursuits. These animated harangues were attended with rapid success and a reformation soon took place in the morals and the life of the people of Crotona. The females were exhorted to become modest, and they left off their gaudy ornaments; the youths were called away from their pursuits of pleasure, and instantly they forgot their intemperance, and paid to their parents that submissive attention and deference which the precepts of Pythagoras required. As to the old, they were directed no longer to spend their time in amassing money, but to improve their understanding, and to seek that peace and those comforts of mind which frugality, benevolence, and philanthropy alone can produce. The sober and religious behaviour of the philosopher strongly recommended the necessity and importance of these precepts. Pythagoras was admired for his venerable aspect, his voice was harmonious, his eloquence persuasive, and the reputation he had acquired by his distant travels, and by being crowned at the Olympic games, was great and important. He regularly frequented the temples of the gods, and paid his devotion to the divinity at an early hour: he lived upon the purest and most innocent food, he clothed himself like the priests of the Egyptian gods, and by his continual purifications and regular offerings, he seemed to be superior to the rest of mankind in sanctity. These artful measures united to render him an object not only of reverence, but of imitation. To set himself at a greater distance from his pupils a number of years was required to try their various dispositions; the most talkative were not permitted to speak in the presence of their master before they had been his auditors for five years, and those who possessed a natural taciturnity were allowed to speak after a probation of two years. When they were capable of receiving the secret instructions of the philosopher they were taught the use of cyphers, and hieroglyphic writings, and Pythagoras might boast that his pupils could correspond together, though in the most distant regions, in unknown characters; and by the signs and words which they had received they could discover, though strangers and barbarians, those that had been educated in the Pythagorean school. So great was his authority among his pupils, that, to dispute his word was deemed a crime, and the most stubborn were drawn to coincide with the opinions of their opponent when they helped their arguments by the words of the master said so, an expression which became proverbial in jurare in verba magistri. The great influence which the philosopher possessed in his school, was transferred to the world: the pupils divided the applause and the approbation of the people with their venerable master, and in a short time, the rulers and the legislators of all the principal towns of Greece, Sicily, and Italy, boasted in being the disciples of Pythagoras. The Samian philosopher was the first who supported the doctrine of metempsychosis, or transmigration of the soul into different bodies, and those notions he seemed to have imbibed among the priests of Egypt, or in the solitary retreats of the Brachmans. More strenuously to support his chimerical system, he declared he recollected the 207 different bodies which his soul had animated before that of the son of Mnesarchus. He remembered to have been Æthalides, the son of Mercury, to have assisted the Greeks during the Trojan war in the character of Euphorbus, [Vid Euphorbus,] to have been Hermotimus, afterwards a fisherman, and last of all Pythagoras. He forbade his disciples to eat flesh, as also beans, because he supposed them to have been produced from the same putrefied matter from which, at the creation of the world, man was formed. In his theological system, Pythagoras supported that the universe was created from a shapeless heap of passive matter by the hands of a powerful being, who himself was the mover and soul of the world, and of whose substance the souls of mankind were a portion. He considered numbers as the principles of every thing, and perceived in the universe regularity, correspondence, beauty, proportion, and harmony, as intentionally produced by the Creator. In his doctrines of morality, he perceived in the human mind, propensities common to us with the brute creation, but besides these, and the passions of avarice and ambition, he discovered the nobler seeds of virtue, and supported that the most ample and perfect gratification was to be found in the enjoyment of moral and intellectual pleasures. The thoughts of the past he considered as always present to us, and he believed that no enjoyment could be had where the mind was disturbed by consciousness of guilt, or fears about futurity. This opinion induced the philosopher to recommend to his followers a particular mode of education. The tender years of the Pythagoreans were employed in continual labour, in study, in exercise, and repose; and the philosopher maintained his well known and important maxim, that many things, especially love, are best learnt late. In a more advanced age, the adult was desired to behave with caution spirit, and patriotism, and to remember, that the community and civil society demanded his exertions, and that the good of the public, and not his own private enjoyments, were the ends of his creation. From lessons like these, the Pythagoreans were strictly enjoined to call to mind, and carefully to review, the actions, not only of the present, but of the preceding days. In their acts of devotion, they early repaired to the most solitary places of the mountains and after they had examined their private and public conduct, and conversed with themselves, they joined in the company of their friends, and early refreshed their bodies with light and frugal aliments. Their conversation was of the most innocent nature; political or philosophic subjects were discussed with propriety, but without warmth, and after the conduct of the following day was regulated, the evening was spent with the same religious ceremony as the morning in a strict and impartial self examination From such regularity nothing but the most salutary consequences could arise, and it will not appear wonderful that the disciples of Pythagoras were so much respected and admired as legislators, and imitated for their constancy, friendship, and humanity The authors that lived in, and after, the age of Alexander, have rather tarnished than brightened the glory of the founder of the Pythagorean school, and they have obscured his fame by attributing to him actions which were dissonant with his character as a man and a moralist. To give more weight to his exhortations, as some writers mention, Pythagoras retired into a subterraneous cave where his mother sent him intelligence of every thing which happened during his absence. After a certain number of months he again reappeared on the earth, with a grim and ghastly countenance, and declared, in the assembly of the people that he was returned from hell. From similar exaggerations, it has been asserted that he appeared at the Olympic games with a golden thigh, and that he could write in letters of blood whatever he pleased on a looking glass, and that by setting it opposite to the moon, when full, all the characters which were on the glass became legible on the moon's disc. They also support, that, by some magical words, he tamed a bear, stopped the flight of an eagle, and appeared on the same day and at the same instant in the cities of Crotona and Metapontum, &c The time and the place of the death of this great philosopher are unknown; yet many suppose that he died at Metapontum about 497 years before Christ; and so great was the veneration of the people of Magna Græcia for him, that he received the same honours as were paid to the immortal gods, and his house became a sacred temple. Succeeding ages likewise acknowledged his merits, and when the Romans, A. U. C. 411, were commanded by the oracle of Delphi to erect a statue to the bravest and wisest of the Greeks, the distinguished honour was conferred on Alcibiades and Pythagoras. Pythagoras had a daughter, called Damo. There is now extant a poetical composition ascribed to the philosopher, and called the golden verses of Pythagoras, which contain the greatest part of his doctrines and moral precepts; but many support, that it is a supposititious composition, and that the true name of the writer was Lysis. Pythagoras distinguished himself also by his discoveries in geometry, astronomy, and mathematics, and it is to him that the world is indebted for the demonstration of the forty-seventh proposition of the first book of Euclid's elements, about the square of the hypothenuse. It is said that he was so elated after making the discovery, that he made an offering of a hecatomb to the gods, but the sacrifice was undoubtedly of small oxen, made with wax, as the philosopher was ever an enemy to shedding the blood of all animals. His system of the universe, in which he placed the sun in the centre, and all the planets moving in elliptical orbits round it, was deemed numerical and improbable, till the deep enquiries and the philosophy of the last ooth century proved it, by the most accurate calculations, to be true and incontestable. Diogenes, Porphyry, Nambilicus, and others, have written an account of his life, but with more erudition perhaps than veracity. Cic de Nat D. 1, 5.—Tusc. 4, 1.—Diog Ac. 8.—Hygin. fab. 112.—*Ovid. PYTHEAS, a native of Massilia (Marseilles) His era is uncertain; some writers place him under the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus, but others have undertaken to show that he was anterior to Aristotle. Pytheas is numbered among the Greek geographical writers. He made many important discoveries in a voyage which he undertook to the north of Europe, and was the first geographer who could call astronomical knowledge to his aid. Leaving the harbour of Massilia, and sailing from cape to cape, he coasted along all the eastern shore of Spain, passed the straits of Gibraltar, navigated the coasts of Lusitania, Aquitania, and Armorica, entered the English Channel, followed the eastern shores of Britain, and, on reaching its northern extremity, advanced six days' sail farther to the north, until he reached a country which the inhabitants called Thule, and where the length of the solstitial day was twenty-four hours, which corresponds to 66° 30' N. L. or modern Iceland. In a second voyage, Pytheas passed through the English Channel into the German Ocean, and thence into the Baltic, where he reached the mouth of a river which he calls the Tanais, but which is, perhaps, the Vistula In this vicinity the amber of commerce was obtained. Pytheas wrote in Greek two works, one entitled "A Description of the Ocean," of which Geminus Rhodius makes mention, and the other a "Periplus," or "Periodus of the earth," mentioned by Marcianus, the scholiast on Apollonius Rhodius. Plut. de Opin 3 17. Strab 2, &c.—Plin. 37.

PYTHES, a Lydian, famous for his riches in the age of Xerxes. He kindly entertained the monarch and all his army, when he was marching on his expedition against Greece, and offered him to defray the expenses of the whole war. Xerxes thanked him with much gratitude, and promised to give him whatever he should require. Pytheus asked him to dismiss his son from the expedition; upon which the monarch ordered the youngman to be cut into two, and one half of the body to be placed on the right hand of the way, and the other on the left, that his army might march between them. Herod PYTHIA, the priestess of Apollo at Delphi. She delivered the answers of the god to such as came to consult the oracle, and was supposed to be suddenly inspired by the sulphureous vapours which issued from the hole of a subterraneous cavity within the temple, over which she sat bare on a three-legged stool, called a tripod. In the stool was a small aperture, through which the vapour was inhaled by the priestess, and, at this divine inspiration, her eyes suddenly sparkled, her hair stood on end and a shivering ran over all her body. In this convulsive state she spoke the oracles of the god, often with loud howlings and cries and her articulations were taken down by the priest and set in order. Sometimes the spirit of inspiration was more gentle, and not always violent, yet Plutarch mentions one of the priestesses who was thrown into such an excessive fury, that not only those that consulted the oracle, but also the priests that conducted her to the sacred tripod, and attended her during the inspiration, were terrified and forsook the temple, and so violent was the fit, that she continued for some days in the most agonizing tortures, and at last died. The Pythia, before she placed herself on the tripod, used to wash her whole body, and particularly her hair, in the waters of the fountain Castalia, at the foot of mount Parnassus. She also shook a laurel tree that grew near the place, and sometimes eat the leaves, with which she crowned herself. The priestess was originally a virgin, but the institution was changed when Echecrates, a Thessalian, had offered violence to one of them, and none but women who were above the age of fifty, were permitted to enter upon that sacred office. They always appeared dressed in the garments of virgins to intimate their purity and modesty, and they were solemnly bound to observe the strictest laws of temperance and chastity, that neither fasting dresses nor lascivious behaviour might bring the office, the religion or the sanctity of the place into contempt. There was originally but one Pythia, besides subordinate priests, yet afterwards two were chosen, and sometimes more. The most celebrated of all these is Phemonoe, who is supposed by some to have been the first who gave oracles at Delphi. The oracles were always delivered in hexameter verses, a custom which was some time after discontinued. The Pythia was consulted only one month in the year, about the spring. It was always required, that those who consulted the oracle should make large presents to Apollo, and from thence arose the opulence, splendour, and the magnificence of that celebrated temple of Delphi. Sacrifices were also offered to the divinity, and if the omens proved unfavorable, the priestess refused to give an answer. There were generally five priests who were engaged at the offering of the sacrifices, and there was also another who attended the Pythia, and assisted her in receiving the oracle. Vid Delphi, Oraculum.] Pous 10, 5.—Justin. 24, 5.—Plut. de Orat. def.—Eurip. in Ion.—Chrysost. —— Games celebrated in honour of Apollo, near the temple of Delphi. They were at first instituted, according to the more received opinion, by Apollo himself, in commemoration of the victory which he had obtained over the serpent Python, from which they received their name; though others maintain that they were first established by Agamemnon, or Diomedes, or by Amphictyon, or, lastly, by the council of the Amphictyons, B. C. 1263. They were originally celebrated once in nine years, but afterwards every fifth year, on the second year of every Olympiad, according to the number of the Parnassian nymphs who congratulated Apollo after his victory. The gods themselves were originally among the number of the combatants, and, according to some authors, the first prizes were won by Pollux in boxing, Castor, in horse races, Hercules, in the pancratium; Zetes, in fighting with the armour; Calais, in running; Telamon, in wrestling, and Peleus, in throwing the quoit. These illustrious conquerors were rewarded by Apollo himself, who was present, with crowns and laurels. Some, however, observe, that at first it was nothing but a musical contention, in which he who sung best the praises of Apollo obtained the prize, consisting of presents of gold or silver, which were afterwards exchanged for a garland of the palm tree, or of beech leaves. It is said that Hesiod was refused admission to these games because he was not able to play upon the harp which was required of all such as entered the lists. The songs which were sung were called nomoi, the Pythian nodes, divided into five parts, which contained a representation of the fight and victory of Apollo over Python; ἐνόπωσις, the preparation for the fight; ὕμνος, the first attempt; κατακελευσμὸς, taking breath and collecting courage; ἰαμβος καὶ ἀνάπαιστος, the insulting sarcasms of the god over his vanquished enemy; σφαγὴ, an imitation of the hisses of the serpent, just as he expired under the blows of Apollo. A dance was also introduced; and in the forty-eighth Olympiad, the Amphictyons, who presided over the games, increased the number of musical instruments by the addition of a flute; but, as it was more peculiarly used in funeral songs and lamentations, it was soon rejected as unfit for merriment, and the festivals which represented the triumph of Apollo over the conquered serpent. The Romans, according to some, introduced them into their city, and called them Apollinares Ludi. Paus. 10, 13, 37. —Ovid Met. 1, 447.

Some, however, suppose that it was produced from the earth by Juno, and sent by the goddess to persecute Latona, who was then pregnant by Jupiter. Latona escaped his fury by means of her lover, who changed her into a quail during the remaining months of her pregnancy, and afterwards restored her to her original shape in the island of Delos, where she gave birth to Apollo and Diana. Apollo, as soon as he was born, attacked the monster, and killed him with his arrows, and in commemoration of the victory which he had obtained, he instituted the celebrated Pythian games Strab. 8.—Paus. 2, 7, 10, 6.—Hygin.—Ovid Met. 1 438, &c. Lucan 5, 134.

Q

QUADI, a German nation, on the south-eastern borders of the country, in what is now Moravia. They were connected with the Marcomanni, and along with them waged war against the Romans. The emperor, Marcus Antoninus, proceeded against them in person, and repressed their inroads, but they soon after renewed hostilities with increased vigour. Their name disappears from history about the fifth century. Their territory was bounded on the south by the Danube, on the east by the river Gran and the Jazyges, on the north by the Carpates and Sudetes, and on the north by the Marcomanni. Tacit. in Germ. 42 et 43. Ann. 2, 63.

QUADRATUS, a surname given to Mercury, because some of his statues were square. T. Ummidius a governor of Syria in the age of Nero. Tacit. Ann. 12, 45 et 54.

QUADRIFRONS, or QUADRICEPS, a surname of Janus, because he was represented with four heads. He had a temple on the Tarpeian rock, raised by L. Catulus.

QUÆSTORES, two officers at Rome, first created A. U. C. 269. They received their name a quærendo, because they collected the revenues of the state, and had the total management of the public treasury. The quæstorship was the first office which could be had in the state. It was requisite that the candidates should be twenty-four or twenty-five years of age, or according to some, twenty-seven. In the year 332, U. C. two more were added to the others, to attend the consuls, to take care of the pay of the armies abroad, and to sell the plunder and booty which had been acquired by conquest. These were called peregrini, whilst the others, whose employment was in the city, received the name of urbani. When the Romans were masters of all Italy, four more were created, A. U. C. 439, to attend the proconsuls and prætors in their provinces, and to collect all the taxes and customs which each particular district owed to the republic. They were called provinciales. Sylla the dictator, created twenty quæstors, and Julius Cæsar, forty, to fill up the vacant seats in the senate; from whence it is evident that the quæstors ranked as senators in the senate. The quæstors were always appointed by the senate at Rome, and if any person was appointed to the quæstorship without their permission, he was only called proquæstor. The quæstores urbani were apparently of more consequence than the rest, the treasury was entrusted to their care, they kept an account of all receipts and disbursements, and the Roman eagles or ensigns were always in their possession when the armies were not on an expedition. They required every general before he triumphed to tell them, upon his oath, that he had given a just account of the number of the slain on both sides, and that he had been saluted imperator by the soldiers, a title which every commander generally received first in his army after he had obtained a victory, and which was afterwards confirmed and approved by the senate. The city quæstors had also the care of the ambassadors; they lodged and received them. They took care also of the funerals of those who were buried at the public expense. Augustus took from them the charge of the treasury, and gave it to the prætors, or to those who had been prætors, but Claudius restored it to the quæstors. Afterwards præfects of the treasury seem to have been appointed. Augustus, as a compensation for depriving them of the care of the treasury, allowed the quæstors the charge of the public regords, which the ædiles had formerly exercised. He introduced also a kind of quæstors, called quæstores candidati, who used to carry the messages of the emperor to the senate, and who were called candidati, because they sued for higher preferment, which by the interest of the emperor they were sure to obtain. Constantine instituted a new kind of quæstors, called quæstores palatii, who were much the same with what we call chancellors. The tent of the quæstor in the camp was called quæstorium. It stood near that of the general.

QUERCENS, a Rutulian who fought against the Trojans. Virg Æn 9 654.

QUERQUETULANUS, a name given to mount Cœlius at Rome, from the oaks which grew there. Tacit Ann. 4, 65.

QUIETIS FANUM, a temple without the walls of the city of Rome, near the Colline gate, Quies was the goddess of rest, whom the Romans refused to receive within their city, probably because the glory of their empire rested on security. Some suppose that Quies means Death, or Proserpine. Liv. 4, 4.—August. de Civ. D. 4, 16.

QUINCTIA PRATA. [Vid. Quintia.]

QUINCTIUS, T. a Roman consul who gained some victories over the Æqui and the Volsci, and obtained a triumph for subduing Præneste. —A Roman celebrated for his frugality. [Vid. Cincinnatus.]

QUINDECIMVIRI, an order of priests whom Tarquin the Proud appointed to take care of the Sibylline books. They were originally two, but afterwards the number was increased to ten, to whom Sylla added five more, whence their name. Vid. Decemviri and Duumviri.

QUINQUATRIA, a festival in honour of Minerva at Rome, which continued during five days. The beginning of the celebration was the 18th of March. The first day sacrifices and oblations were presented, but however without the effusion of blood. On the second, third, and fourth days, shows of gladiators were exhibited, and on the fifth day there was a solemn procession through the streets of the city. On the days of the celebration, scholars obtained holidays, and it was usual for them to offer prayers to Minerva for learning and wisdom, which the goddess patronised; and on their return to school they presented their master with a gift which has received the name of Minerval. They were much the same as the Panathenæa of the Greeks. Plays were also acted, and disputations held on literature. They received their name from the five days which were devoted to the celebration.

QUINQUENNĀLES LUDI, games celebrated by the Chians in honour of Homer every fifth year. There were also some games among the Romans which bore this name. They are the same as the Actian games. Vid. Actia.

QUINTIA PRATA, a place on the borders of the Tiber near Rome, which had been cultivated by the great Cincinnatus. Liv. 3, 26.

QUINTILIANUS Marcus Fabius, a celebrated teacher of eloquence, was born about A. D. 42, in the reign of the emperor Claudius. He is supposed to have descended from a family originally Spanish, but that his father, or grandfather, had settled in Rome. The place of his birth is not known, but it seems certain that he was educated at the capital, where he studied rhetoric under Domitius Afer, a celebrated orator. He opened a school at Rome, and was the first who obtained a salary, from the state as a public teacher. After he had remained twenty years in this laborious employment, and obtained the applause of the most illustrious Romans, not merely as a preceptor, but as a pleader at the bar, Quintilian retired to enjoy the fruits of his labou s and industry. In his retirement he assiduously devoted his time to the study of literature, and wrote a treatise on the "Causes of the Corruption of Eloquence." Some time after he wrote his "Institutiones Oratoriæ," the most perfect and complete system of oratory extant. It is, in truth, one of the most valuable remains of antiquity. It was composed for the use of his son, whose early death he had occasion to deplore, and is an institute for the education of an orator, whom he takes up from the cradle, and conducts through all the periods of instruction to the exercise of his proper art. It accordingly contains many excellent precepts with respect to education in general, especially the early parts of it, which are applicable to all times and countries, as being founded on the nature of the mind. The style of Quintilian is said by critics to exhibit tokens of the deterioration of the Latin tongue; but, on the other hand, it must be observed, that every deviation from the usage of the Augustan age has been too readily regarded as a depravation. Quintilian was appointed preceptor to the two young princes whom Domitian destined for his successors on the throne; but the celebrity which the rhetorician received from the favours and attention of the emperor, and from the success which his writings met with in the world, were embittered by the loss of his wife, and of his two sons, one of whom he describes as a prodigy of early excellence. It is said that Quintilian was poor in his retirement, and that his indigence was relieved by the liberality of his pupil, Pliny the younger. He is supposed to have died about A. D. 95. His "Institutiones" were discovered in the 1415th year of the Christian era, in an old tower of a monastery at St Gall, by Poggio Bracciolini. The treatise on the "Causes and Corruption of Eloquence" has not come down to us. The name of Quintilian is affixed to certain "Declamations," of which there are nineteen of moderate length, but as the style, method, and manner, are totally different from the rules laid down in the "Institutiones," no good judges attribute them to the name of Quintilian. Of the editions of Quintilian some of the most valuable are those of Burmann, 3 vols 4to Lugd. Bat. 1720; of Capperonier, fol. Paris, 1725; of Gesner, 4to. Gotting. 1, 66; and that of Spalding, 4 vols. 8vo. Lips. 1798—1816, increased by the addition of a fifth volume in 1829, containing supplementary annotations, and an Index to the entire work, by Zumpt. There is an English translation by Mr Guthrie.

QUINTILLUS, M. Aurelius Claudius a brother of Claudius, who proclaimed himself emperor, and seventeen days after destroyed himself by opening his veins in a bath, when he heard that Aurelian was marching against him, about the 270th year of the Christian era.

QUINTIUS or QUINCTIUS, one of the names of Cincinnatus. Pers. 1, 73.——Cæso, the son of Cincinnatus was banished for opposing the tribunes. He was the first who gave bail for his appearance, and by forfeiting it, his father was almost reduced to ruin, and obliged to sell his property and live in obscure retirement. Liv. 3, 11, &c.

QUINTUS CURTIUS RUFUS, a Roman historian, who is known now only for his history of the reign of Alexander the Great, is supposed to have flourished in the reign of Vespasian or Trajan; but many doubts have been entertained on the subject. No notice is taken of his work till the twelfth century, though it is thought that Suetonius refers to the author as one among the eminent rhetoricians of those times. This history was divided into ten books, of which the first two, the end of the fifth, and the commencement of the sixth are lost. It has ever been esteemed for the elegance, purity, and floridness of its style. It is, however, vastly defective as a history, abounding with anachronisms, and various geographical mistakes. The best editions of this work are, that of Snakenburg, Lugd. Bat. 1724, 4to., and that of Schmeider, Gotting. 1803, 8vo. There is an English translation by Digby in 2 vols. 12mo.

QUIRINALIA, festivals in honour of Romulus, surnamed Quirinus, celebrated on the 13th of the calends of March.

QUIRINĀLIS a hill at Rome, originally called Agonius, and afterwards Collinus. The name of Quirinalis is obtained from the inhabitants of Cures, who settled there under their king Tatius. It was also called Cabalinus, from two marble statues of a horse one of which was the work of Phidias, and the other of Praxiteles. Liv. 1, 44. —Ovid. Fast. 375. Met. 14 845. —One of the gates of Rome near mount Quirinalis.

QUIRĪNUS, a surname of Mars among the Romans. This name was also given to Romulus when he had been made a god by his superstitious subjects. Ovid. Fast. 2, 475. —Also a surname of the god Janus. —— Sulpitius, a Roman consul born at Lanuvium. Though descended of an obscure family, he was raised to the greatest honours by Augustus. He was appointed governor of Syria, and was afterwards made preceptor to Caius, the grandson of the emperor. He married Æmilia Lepida, the grand-daughter of Sylla and Pompey, but some time after he shamefully repudiated her. He died A. D. 22. Tacit. Ann. 3, &c.

QUIRITES, a name given to the Roman citizens, because they admitted into their city the Sabines, who inhabited the town of Cures, and who on that account were called Quirites. After this union, the two nations were indiscriminately and promiscuously called by that name. It is, however, to be observed that the word was confined to Rome, and not used in the armies, as we find some of the generals applying it only to such of their soldiers as they dismissed or disgraced. Even some of the emperors appeased a sedition, by calling their rebellious soldiers by the degrading appellation of Quirites. Sueton. Cæs. 120. – Lamprid. 53. – Lucan. 5, 558. – Horat. od. 4, 14. 1. – Varro de L. L. 4. – Liv. 1, 13. – Ovid. Fast. 2, 479.

R

RABIRIUS, C. Posthumus, a Roman knight, who lent an immense sum of money to Ptolemy Auletes, king of Egypt. The monarch afterwards, not only refused to repay him, but even confined him, and endangered his life. Rabirius escaped from Egypt with difficulty, but at his return to Rome, he was accused by the senate of having lent money to an African prince, for unlawful purposes. He was ably defended by Cicero, and acquitted with difficulty. Cic. pro Rab. – Caius, a senator, accused by Labienus, at the solicitation of Cæsar, of killing the tribune Saturninus 30 years before. He appealed from the sentence of death pronounced against him by Cæsar, and was acquitted by the popular assembly. Hortensius and Cicero were his defenders. Dio 37, 26, &c. – A Roman epic poet, of whom little is known. He flourished during the Augustan age. Velleius Paterculus names him immediately after Homer, but Quintilian speaks of him in a much more moderate tone. The grammarians have preserved for us some verses of one of his poems. Its subject was the battle of Actium. Vell. Pat. 2, 36. – Quintil. 10, 1.

RACILIUS, L. a tribune who complained in the senate of the faction of Clodius. Cic. in Ver. 2, 12. ad Q. fr. 2, 1.

RAMNES, or RHAMNENSES, one of the three centuries instituted by Romulus. After the Roman people had been divided into three tribes, the monarch elected out of each 100 young men of the best and noblest families, with which he formed three companies of horse. One of them was called Ramnes, either from the tribe of which it was chosen, or from Romulus. Another was called Tatienses, and the third Luceres either from Lucumo, an Etrurian, or from lucus the grove which Romulus made an asylum. The Rhamnenses consisted of Romans, and inhabited the Palatine hill; the Tatienses of Sabines, and dwelt on the Capitoline hill, the Luceres were composed of all the foreigners who came successively to Rome, after the union with the Sabines. This arrangement, however, was subsequently altered. [Vid Equites.] Varr. de L. L. 4, 9. – Liv. 1, 13. – Horat de Art. Poet. 304. Plut in Rom.

RAMPSINITUS, an Egyptian monarch, of whom Herodotus relates the following legend. "After this, they said, Rampsinitus descended alive into those places which the Grecians call Hades; when playing at dice with Ceres, he sometimes won, and at other times lost; that at his return he brought with him as a present a napkin of gold." Herod 2, 122.

RAPHIA, now Refah, a town of Palestine, near the sea-coast at the south of Gaza. It was near it that Antiochus king of Syria, was defeated by the forces of Ptolemy the 4th king of Egypt, under the conduct of Nicolaus the Ætolian general. Polyb. 5, 82.

RASCIPORIS, a Macedonian sent to the assistance of Pompey. Cæsar. Bell Civ. 3, 4.

RAVENNA, a city of Cisalpine Gaul situate on the coast, a short distance below the Spinetic mouth of the Padus, or Po. It was originally founded by some Thessalians, but they subsequently abandoned it to the Umbri, being unable to resist the aggressions of the Tusci. It received afterwards a Roman colony. When Rome was possessed by the barbarians, it became the residence of the emperors of the west, and afterwards of the exarchs appointed by the emperors of the east, when the northern part of Italy was in the possession of the Lombards. It was badly supplied with water, but though situated in the midst of marshes, it was a healthy place, owing to the regularity of its tides. Its port, at the mouth of the river Bedesis, or Ronco, became the arsenal and great naval station of the Romans on the Adriatic; but Augustus caused a new port to be constructed near the mouth of the neighbouring river Candianus, or Candiano, which was then called Portus Classis, and may be still traced in Val di Classe. Strab 5. – Plin. 3, 15. 14, 2. – Sil Ital 8. 603. Martial 3, 56. 13, 18. – Claudian de VI. Cons. Hon. 491. – Suet. in Aug. 49. – Tacit. Ann. 4, 5. Hist. 2, 100.

RAURACI, a people of Belgic Gaul, on the Upper Rhine, north east of the Sequani. Their chief towns were Basilia, now Basel, and Augusta, now Basel Augst. Cæs. B. G. 1, 29. – Plin. 4, 17.

REATE, now Rieti, a town in the country of the Sabines, on the river Velinus, a branch of the Nar. It is said to have been built before the Trojan war, and to have derived its name from Rhea or Cybele. It was celebrated for its breeds of mules and asses, and was situated in a valley so pleasant, as to merit the appellation of Tempe. Its luxuriant meadows obtained the name of Rosei Campi, and are still called Le Rose. Sil. Ital 8, 417. – Strab. 5. – Varro. R. R. 1. 7. 2, 1. – Plin. 8, 43. 17, 4. – Cic. Ep. ad Att 4. 15.

REDICULUS, a deity whose name is derived from the word redire (to return). The Romans raised a temple to this imaginary deity on the spot where Annibal had retired when he approached Rome, as if to besiege it.

REDONES, a Gallic nation in the interior of Lugdunensis Tertia, north of the Namnetes and the mouth of the Liger, or Loire. Their capital was Condate, now Rennes. Cæs. B. G. 7, 75. – Plin 4, 18.

REGIFUGIUM, a festival at Rome, to celebrate the flight of the Tarquins. On that occasion, after sacrifices were offered to the goddess of liberty, the chief or king of the priests was obliged to fly from the temple, and to take refuge in the country for a few days. Ovid. Fast. 2, 685. 5, 728.

REGILLÆ, or REGILLUM, a Sabine town, near Eretum, which latter place was north of Nomentum and north-west of Tibur. Regillum is only known as the birth-place of Atta Clausus, who, under the name of Appius Claudius, became the founder of the Claudian family at Rome. Liv. 2. 16.—Dion H. 5, 40.—Suet. Tib 1.

REGILLIANUS, Q. NONIUS, a Dacian who entered the Roman armies, and was raised to the greatest honours under Valerian. He was elected emperor by the populace, who were dissatisfied with Gallienus, and was soon after murdered by his soldiers A. D. 262

REGILLUS, a small lake of Latium, north west of Præneste and south-east of Gabii. It was the scene of a great battle between the Romans and Latins, after the expulsion of Tarquin, in which the latter were totally defeated. The lake Regillus is thought to be il Lughetto della Colonna, near the small town of that name. Cic. de Nat D 2 et 3. - Pun. 33, 6.—Val. Max. 1, 8. - Flor. 4, 2.

REGIUM LEPIDUM, or Forum Lepidi, a town of Cisalpine Gaul, between Parma and Mutina. It is noticed in history as having witnessed the death of the elder Brutus by order of Pompey, to whom he had surrendered himself. Cæ. Ep. ad Fam. 12, 5 Liv. Epit 90.—Val. Max 6, 8.

REGULUS, M. ATTILIUS, a consul during the first Punic war. He reduced Brundusium, and in his second consulship he took 64 and sunk 30 galleys of the Carthaginian fleet, on the coasts of Sicily. Afterwards he landed in Africa, and so rapid was his success, that in a short time he defeated three generals, and made himself master of about 200 places of consequence on the coast. The Carthaginians sued for peace, but the conqueror refused to grant it, and soon after he was defeated in a battle by Xanthippus, and 30,000 of his men were left on the field of battle, and 15,000 taken prisoners. Regulus was in the number of the captives, and he was carried in triumph to Carthage He was afterwards sent by the enemy to Rome, to propose an accommodation, and an exchange of prisoners, and if his commission was unsuccessful, he was bound by the most solemn oaths to return to Carthage without delay. When he came to Rome, Regulus dissuaded his countrymen from accepting the terms which the enemy proposed, and when his opinion had had due influence on the senate, he then retired to Carthage agreeably to his engagements. The Carthaginians were told that their offers of peace had been rejected at Rome, by the means of Regulus, and therefore they prepared to punish him with the greatest severity. His eyebrows were cut, and he was exposed for some days to the excessive heat of the meridian sun, and afterwards confined in a barrel, whose sides were every where filled with large iron spikes, till he died in the greatest agonies. His sufferings were heard of at Rome, and the senate permitted his widow to inflict whatever punishments she pleased on some of the most illustrious captives of Carthage, who were in their hands. She confined them also in presses filled with sharp iron points, and was so exquisite in her cruelty, that the senate at last interfered, and stopped the barbarity of her punishments. Regulus died about 251 years before Christ. Sil. 6, 319.—Flor. 2, 3.—Horat. Od. 3 5. - Cic de Off. 1, 13.—Val. Max. 1, 1. 2.—Liv. ep 16 ——Mentinus, a Roman made governor of Greece by Caligula. While Regulus was in his province, the emperor wished to bring the celebrated statue of Jupiter Olympius, by Phidias, to Rome; but this was supernaturally prevented, and, according to ancient authors, the ship which was to convey it was destroyed by lightning, and the workmen who attempted to remove the statue, were terrified away by sudden noises. Dio. Cass.——A man who condemned Sejanus.——Roscius, a man who held the consulship but for one day, in the reign of Vitellius.

REMI, a people of Gallia Belgica, south-west of the Treveri, and south-east of the Veromandui. Their chief cities were Durocortorum, now Rheims and Bibrax now Bievre. Cæs. B. G. 2, 5.—Tacit. Hist 4, 67.—Plin. 4, 17.

REMMIA LEX de ambitu, was enacted to punish all calumniators. The letter K was marked on their forehead This law was abolished by Constantine the Great. Cic. pro Ros REMULUS, a chief of Tibur, whose arms were seized by the Rutulians, and afterwards became part of the plunder which Eurysalus obtained. Virg. Æn. 9, 360.——A friend of Turnus, trampled to death by his horse which Orsinebius had wounded. Id. 11, 636, &c.——Sylvius, a king of Alba, destroyed by lightning on account of his impiety. Ovid. Trist. 4, 50.

REMURIA, festivals established at Rome by Romulus, to appease the manes of his brother Remus. They were afterwards called Lemuria, and celebrated yearly.

REMUS, the brother of Romulus, was exposed together with him, by the cruelty of his grandfather. In the contest which happened between the two brothers about building a city, Romulus obtained the preference, and Remus for ridiculing the rising walls, was put to death by his brother's orders, or by Romulus himself. [Vid. Romulus.] The Romans were afflicted with a plague after this murder, upon which the oracle was consulted, and the manes of Remus appeased by the institution of Remuria. Ovid Fast. 4, 837. 5, 469 ——One of the auxiliaries of Turnus against Æneas. Virg. Æn. 9, 330.

RESÆNA, now Ras al Ain, a town of Mesopotamia, not many miles from the source of the river Chaborus. It was famous for the defeat which the Persians there suffered from the emperor Gordian. It was made a Roman colony by Septimius Severus, after which its name was changed to Theodosiopolis.

RHA, a large river, now the Volga, which rises from two sources, the more eastern of these, or the Rha Orientalis, now the Kama, has its source in the Hyperborei Montes, whilst the Rha Occidentalis, or true Volga, rises considerably to the westward of it, in the heart of Russia: after their junction, the united stream flows with a southerly direction into the Caspian sea, which it enters by many mouths at Astrakhan. Its greatest length is 2100 miles, or about 500 more than the Danube. It was famed for the root Rha barbarum, now called Rhubarb, which grew upon its banks, and was held in great esteem among the medicines of the ancients.

RHACIUS, a Cretan prince, the first of that nation who entered Ionia with a colony. He seized Claros, of which he became the sovereign. He married Manto, the daughter of Tiresias, who had been seized on his coasts. Paus. 7, 3.

RHACOTIS, the name of a maritime place in Egypt, on the site of which Alexandria was subsequently erected. Strab. 17

RHADAMANTHUS, a son of Jupiter and Europa. He was born in Crete, which he abandoned about the thirtieth year of his age. He passed into some of the Cyclades, where he reigned with so much justice and impartiality, that the ancients have said he became one of the judges of hell, and that he was employed in the infernal regions in obliging the dead to confess their crimes, and in punishing them for their offences. Rhadamanthus reigned not only over some of the Cyclades but over many of the Greek cities of Asia. Plat. 8, 53.—Ovid. Met. 9, 435.—Homer. Il. 4, 564.—Virg. Æn. 6, 566.

RHADAMISTUS, a son of Pharnasmanes king of Iberia. He married Zenobia, the daughter of his uncle Mithridates, king of Armenia, and some time after put him to death. He was put to death by his father for his cruelties, about the year fifty-two of the Christian era. Tacit. Ann. 13, 37.

RHÆTI or RÆTI an ancient and warlike nation of Etruria. Vid Rhætia

RHÆTIA, a country of Europe Rhætia in its extended sense, comprehended the country between Italy and the Danube, from the confines of the Helvetii to Noricum; but these limits included the territory of the Vindelici. Rhætia Propria was bounded on the north by Vindelicia, on the east by Noricum, on the south by the Italian provinces Venetia and Gallia Cisalpina, and on the west by the Gallic province Maxima Sequanorum It contained nearly the whole of Tyrol, the Valtelina, Vorarberg, Lichtenstein, and the east part of Switzerland (in the cantons of Grisons, Tessin, Glarus, St Gallen, Thurgau, and Appenzell) The Rhæti were said to be Tuscans, who fled from the Gauls when that nation invaded Italy, and to have been so called from their leader Rhætus They were composed of many small tribes, who in time became powerful to make frequent incursions into the Roman territory, till their submission was effected, during the reign of Augustus, by the Roman armies under the command of Drusus and Tiberius Nero. Virg. G. 2 96.—Plin. 3, 20 14 2, &c. - Horat. Od. 4, 4 et 14.

RHAMNES a king and augur, who assisted Turnus against Æneas He was killed in the night by Nisus Virg. Æn. 9 325.

RHAMNUS, a town of Attica, situate on the coast sixty stadia north-east of Marathon It was so called from the plant rhamnus (thornbush) which grew there in abundance. It was much celebrated for the worship of Nemesis, hence styled Rhamnusia virgo, in whose temple was a colossal statue of Parian marble. Its modern name is Eremo Castro Paus. 1, 32 et 33. Ovid. Met 3, 406.—Stat. Sylv. 3, 5, 4

RHAMPSINITUS. Vid Rampsinitus

RHAMSES, or RAMSES, a powerful king of Egypt, who with an army of 700,000 men, conquered Ethiopia, Libya, Persia, and other eastern nations In his reign, according to Pliny, Troy was taken. Some authors consider him to be the same as Sesostris. Tacit. Ann. 2. 60 - Plin 36 8.

RHARIUS Campus, a part of the Thriasian plain in Attica, near Eleusis It was in this plain that Ceres was said to have first sown corn. Paus. 1, 38.

RHASCUPORIS, a king of Thrace, who invaded the possessions of Cotys, and was put to death by order of Tiberius, &c. Tacit. Ann. 2, 64.

RHEA a daughter of Cœlus and Terra, who married Saturn, by whom she had Vesta, Ceres, Juno, Pluto, Neptune, &c. Her husband, however, devoured all his children as soon as born, as he had succeeded to the throne with the solemn promise that he would raise no male offspring, or, according to others because he had been informed by an oracle, that one of his sons would dethrone him. To stop the cruelty of her husband Rhea consulted her parents, and was advised to impose upon him, or perhaps to fly into Crete Accordingly, when she brought forth, the child was immediately concealed, and Saturn devoured up a stone which his wife had given him as her own child. The fears of Saturn were soon proved to be well-founded. A year after, the child whose name was Jupiter, became so strong and powerful, that he drove his father from his throne. Rhea has been confounded by the mythologists with some of the other goddesses, and many have supposed that she was the same divinity that received adoration under the various names of Bona Dea, Cybele, Dindymena, Magna Mater, Ceres, Vesta, Titæa and Terra, Tellus, and Ops [Vid. Cybele, Ceres, Vesta, &c.] Rhea, after the expulsion of her husband from his throne followed him to Italy, where he established a kingdom. Her benevolence in this part of Europe was so great, that the golden age of Saturn is often called the age of Rhea. Orph. in Hymn. Homer. ib. —Eschyl Prom.—Euripid Bacch et Elect. - Ovid. Fast 4, 197 Apollod 1, 1, &c —Silvia, the mother of Romulus and Remus. She is also called Ilia [Vid. Ilia.]—A nymph of Italy, who is said to have born a son called Aventinus to Hercules. Virg. Æn. 7 659.

RHEBAS, or RHEBUS, a little river of Bithynia, flowing from mount Olympus into the Euxine sea. It is now the Rura Apoll. Argon. 2, 651. Dionys Perieg 794.

RHEBUSNÆ Vid Rebones.

RHEGIUM a city of Magna Græcia, at the extremity of Italy, in the territory of the Bruttii, and in a south-eastern direction from Messana on the opposite coast of Sicily. It is supposed to have taken its name from the violent bursting asunder of Italy and Sicily from (ἔρηγω frango.) It was built by a colony from Chalcis, and increased by the Zanclians and Messenians It gave birth to many eminent men, amongst whom may be mentioned the poet Ibycus. Its modern name is Reggio Strab. 6. - Justin. 4, 2 et 3. - Plin. 35, 8. Paus 6, 4.

RHENEA, or RHENEIA a small island near Delos, so near in fact, that Polycrates of Samos is said to have dedicated it to Apollo, connecting it to the latter island by means of a chain. Its modern name is Sdili. Thucyd. 3, 104.—Strab. 10.—Herod 6 97.

RHENI, a people on the borders of the Rhine

RHENUS, a celebrated river of Europe, rising in the Lepontine Alps, a little to the east of mount St Gothard, in the country of the Grisons. It passes through Lacus Brigantinus, or the Lake of Constance, and afterwards through Lacus Acronius, or the Lake of Zell, and continues to run nearly west until it reaches Basilia, or Basel. Here it takes a northern direction, and becomes the boundary between Gallia and Germania, and afterwards between the latter and Belgium. At Schenk, or Schenken Schans, the Rhenus sends off its left-hand branch, the Vahalis, or Whaal, which flows west, and joins the Mosa, or Meuse. After parting with that of the Vahalis, the Rhenus flows on a few miles farther to the north, and then divides into two streams, of which the one to the right hand had the name of Flevo, or Flevus, or Flevum, now the Issel, and the other that of Helium, now the Leek The latter joins the Meuse above Rotterdam The Issel was originally uncon nected with the Rhine, but was joined to it by the canal of Drusus. Before it reached the sea, it traversed a small lake called Flevo, which, by the increase of waters it received through the Issel from the Rhine, became in time expanded, and forms now the Zuyder Zee. The whole course of the Rhine is 900 miles, of which 630 are navigable from Basel to the sea. The Rhine was long a barrier between the Romans and Germans; it was first crossed by Julius Cæsar. Cæs. B. G. 4, 26.—Tac Germ. 1, 28 et 29. Ann. 2, 6 Hist. 2. 26 — Mela, 2, 5. 3, 2.—Plin. 4, 15 ——A small river of Cisalpine Gaul, rising in the northern part of Etruria, and falling into the Padus, or Po. It is now the Reno, and is celebrated in history for the meeting of the second triumvirate, which took place A. U. C. 709, in an island formed by its stream. Plut. Cic et Ant.—Suet. Aug. 96.

RHESUS, a king of Thrace, son of the Strymon and Terpsichore, or, according to others, of Eioneus by Euterpe. After many warlike exploits and conquests in Europe, he marched to the assistance of Priam, king of Troy, against the Greeks He was expected with great impatience, as an ancient oracle had declared, that Troy should never be taken, if the horses of Rhesus drank the waters of the Xanthus, and fed upon the grass of the Trojan plains. This oracle was well known to the Greeks, and therefore two of their best generals, Diomedes and Ulysses, were commissioned by the rest to intercept the Thracian prince. The Greeks entered his camp in the night, slew him, and carried away his horses to their camp. Apollod. 1, 3.—Virg. Æn. 1, 473.—Ovid. Met 13, 98

RHESUS, a son of Nausithous, king of Phæacia Homer Od. 7, 63.

RHIANUS a Greek poet, a native of Bena in Crete, who flourished about 230 B. C He was originally a slave in a school of exercise. Rhianus wrote a Heracleid, Thessalica, Messeniaca, Achaica, and Elisaca. Of all these poems we have only about thirty-three lines remaining RHINOCORURA, a town on the coast of the Mediterranean; assigned at one time to Egypt, at another to Syria, and lying on the confines of both. It received its name from the Greek words ῥὶς nasus, and κολόω mutilo, owing to the circumstance of certain criminals having been sent hither by one of the kings of Egypt, after he had slit their noses to mark them, and thus prevent their returning. It is now called El Arish. Strab. 16.—Lu. 45 11.

RHION, or RHIUM, a promontory of Achaia, opposite Antirrhium is Ætolia The strait is seven stadia across The castle of the Morea occupies the site of this place at the present day.

RHIPHÆI, large mountains at the north of Scythia where, as some suppose, the Gorgons had fixed their residence. The name of Rhipæan was applied to any cold mountain in a northern country, and indeed these mountains seem to have existed only in the imagination of the poets, though some make the Tanais rise there. Plin. 4. 12.—Lucan. 3, 272. 3, 283. 4, 416.—*Virg. RHODANUS, or Rhone, a large and impetuous river of Europe, rising among the Lepontine Alps, two leagues from the sources of the Rhine. In a westerly direction, it proceeds to the Lacus Lemanus, or Lake of Geneva, which it traverses from one extremity to the other. Five leagues below the lake, it disappears between two rocks; but, soon after emerging, it continues to run southward to Augustum, or Aosta, where it suddenly changes its direction, and north-west swiftly flows to Lyons. Thence it moves due south with rapidity, and discharges itself by three mouths into the Mediterranean. The largest of these mouths was called Massiliticum, from its being the nearest to Massilia; the other two were much less, and had the common name of Libyca, although each was also known by a distinct appellation. Hispaniense Ostium denoted the western or the one next to Hispania, and Metapinum, that in the middle. The course of the Rhone is about 400 miles, during which it falls 5400 feet. Mela, 2, 5 3 3.—Ovid. Met. 2, 258 — Sil. Ital 3, 557 —Cæs. B. G 1, 1.—Plin. 3, 4.—Lucan. 1, 433. 6, 475.

RHODOPE, or RHODOPIS, a celebrated courtezan of Greece, who was fellow servant with Æsop, at the court of a king of Samos. She was carried to Egypt by Xanthus, and her liberty was at last bought by Charaxes of Mitylene, the brother of Sappho, who was enamoured of her, and who married her. She sold her favours at Naucratis, where she collected so much money, that, to render her name immortal, she consecrated a number of spits in the temple of Apollo at Delphi; or, according to others, erected one of the pyramids of Egypt. Ælian says, that as Rhodope was one day bathing herself, an eagle carried away one of her sandals, and dropped it near Psammetichus, king of Egypt, at Memphis. The monarch was struck with the beauty of the sandal, strict enquiry was made to find the owner, and Rhodope, when discovered, married Psammetichus. Herod. 2, 134, &c.—Ovid. Heroid. 15, 15. —Ælian. V. H. 13, 33.

RHODOPE, now Despoto, a mountain range of Thrace, detaching itself from mount Scomius at its junction with the Hæmus, and winding through the western and southern parts of Thrace. It was fabled to have received its name from Rhodope, the wife of the Thracian king Hæmus, who was changed into this mountain for presuming to rival Juno. Theocritus classes Rhodope with the highest summits of the ancient world Orid. Met. 6. 87, &c. —Virg. Ecl. 6, 30. G. 3, 351.—Theocr Idyl 7, 77.

RHODOPÆUS, is used in the same signification as Thracius, because Rhodope was a mountain of that country. Ovid. A. A. 3, 321. Heroid. 2. —Virg. G. 4, 461.

RHODUNIA, the top of mount Œta. Liv. 36, 16.

RHODUS, or Rhodes, a celebrated island in the Mediterranean sea, lying south-west of the coast of Caria, and being about forty-three miles distant from the main land It is about forty miles in length, fifteen in breadth, and 120 in circuit. It anciently bore several other names, and is said to have derived that of Rhodes, either from the beautiful nymph Rhode, a favourite of Apollo, or from the word ῥόδον rosa, owing to the profusion of roses with which it abounded; or, as others say, from ῥόος undarum strepitus, from its shores being lashed by violent seas. It is presumed, however, to have obtained its appellation from the Dodanim, otherwise called Rhodanim, an opinion which seems to have been entertained by the Seventy Interpreters, who render the Hebrew word Ῥόδιοι. Its capital was Rhodus or Rhodes, near the northern point of the island, famous for its immense brazen statue of the Sun, called the Colossus. [Vid Colossus], and reckoned one of the seven wonders of the world. Its three other principal cities were Lindus, Ialysus, and Camirus The island of Rhodes is said to have formerly joined the continent, but others assert that it rose from the sea; it was especially sacred to the Sun, and the sky is said to have never been so overcast but that he might be seen. The inhabitants were celebrated for their navigation, and the enterprising spirit which led them to send out colonies to so many parts of the world, they were, during many ages, the most powerful nation by sea. They had their own form of government till Alexander overran Asia, when they lost their independence, but regained it under his successors They assisted Pompey, against Cæsar, and being defeated by Cassius, became dependent on the Romans; for the discontented amongst whom it was a common place of retreat. Their maritime laws were so universally respected, that every country made use of them to decide disputes concerning such matters; they were adopted by other commercial nations, and at last introduced into the Roman code, whence they have been extracted to form the basis of the maritime regulations of modern Europe. Strab. 11. — *Hom. RHOGUS, a city of Syria, the southernmost one in the district of Pieria, fifteen miles from Seleucia, and lying on the Sinus Issicus. It was north-west of Antiochia. It was famous for the manufacture of earthen vessels. Plin. 5, 22. — Cic. Ep. ad Att. 6, 1.

RHOXOLÂNI, a Sarmatian race to the north of the Palus Mœotis. From the testimonies adduced by Malte Brun and others, there is no reason to doubt that the appellation of Russians is derived from that of the Rhoxolani, or Rhoxani. Tacit. Hist 1, 79.

RHOXÂNA, or ROXÂNA, a wife of Alexander, daughter of a Persian satrap. Vid. Roxana.

RHUDIÆ, a city of Italy, in the territory of the Calabri in Iapygia, and below Brundisium. It was rendered famous by being the birth-place of Ennius Its remains are still known by the name of Ruge Sil. Ital 12, 396 — Strab. 6 — A town of Apulia, in Italy, between Canusium and Rubi. It is sometimes called for distinction sake Rhudiæ Peucetiæ, as it lay in the district of Peucetia, the other Rhudiæ being styled Rhudiæ Calabriæ. Its site probably corresponds with that of Andria. Plin. 3, 11. Mela, 2, 4.

RHUTÈNI, a people of Gallia Aquitanica in Narbonensis Prima. The territory was situate on either side of the Tarnis, or Tarn. Segodunum, now Rodez, was their chief city. Cæs. B. G. 1, 7.—Plin. 4, 19.

RHYNDÂCUS, a river of Asia Minor, which separates Mysia from Bithynia. It rises in Azanitis, a district of Phrygia, and after receiving the waters of the Macistus, and other streams of Mysia, discharges itself into the Propontis, opposite to the little island of Besbicus. Strab 12.

ROMA, a city of Italy, the capital of the Roman empire; situate on the banks of the river Tiber, at the distance of about 16 miles from the sea. The name of its founder, and the manner of its foundation, are not precisely known. Romulus, however, is universally supposed to have laid the foundations of that celebrated city, on the 20th of April according to Varro, in the year 3961 of the Julian period, 3251 years after the creation of the world, 753 before the birth of Christ, and 431 years after the Trojan war, and in the 4th year of the sixth Olympiad. In its original state, Rome was but a small castle on the summit of mount Palatine; and the founder, to give his followers the appearance of a nation or a barbarian horde, was obliged to erect a standard as a common asylum, for every criminal, debtor, or murderer, who fled from their native country to avoid the punishment which attended them. From such an assemblage a numerous body was soon collected, and before the death of the founder, the Romans had covered with their habitations, the Palatine, Capitoline, Aventine, Esquiline hills, with mount Cœlius, and Quirinalis. After many successful wars against the neighbouring states, the views of Romulus were directed to regulate a nation naturally fierce, warlike, and uncivilized. The people were divided into classes, the interests of the whole were linked in a common chain, and the labours of the subjects, as well as those of his patron, tended to the same end, the aggrandizement of the state. Under the successors of Romulus, the power of Rome was encreased, and the boundaries of her dominions extended, while one was employed in regulating the forms of worship, and inculcating in the minds of his subjects a reverence for the deity, the other was engaged in forcing discipline among the army, and raising the consequence of the soldiers in the government of the state; and a third made the object of his administration consist in adorning his capital, in beautifying its edifices, and in fortifying it with towers and walls. During 244 years the Romans were governed by kings, but the tyranny, the oppression, and the violence of the last of these monarchs, and of his family, became so atrocious, that a revolution was effected in the state, and the democratical government was established. The monarchical government existed under seven princes, who began to reign in the following order: Romulus, B. C. 753; and after one years interregnum, Numa, 715; Tullus Hostilius, 672; Ancus Martius 640; Tarquin Priscus, 616; Servius Tullius, 578; and Tarquin the Proud, 534, expelled 25 years after, B. C. 509; and this regal administration has been properly denominated the infancy of the Roman empire. After the expulsion of the Tarquins from the throne, the Romans became more sensible of their consequence with their liberty they acquired a spirit of faction, and they became so jealous of their independence, that the first of their consuls who had been the most zealous and animated in the assertion of their freedom, was banished from the city because he bore the name, and was of the family of the tyrants; and another, to stop their suspicions, was obliged to pull down his house, whose stateliness and magnificence above the rest, seemed incompatible with the duties and the rank of a private citizen. They knew more effectually their power when they had fought with success against Porsenna, the king of Etruria, and some of the neighbouring states, who supported the claim of the tyrant, and attempted to replace him on his throne by force of arms. A government which is entrusted into the hands of two of the most distinguished of its members, for the limited space of one year, cannot but give rise to great men, glorious exploits, and tremendous seditions. The general who is placed at the head of an army during a campaign, must be active and diligent, when he knows that his power is terminated with the year, and if he has a becoming ambition, he will distinguish his consulship by some uncommon act of valour, before he descends from the dignity of an absolute magistrate to the dependence of a fellow citizen. Yet these attempts for the attainments of glory, often failed of success; and though the Romans could once boast that every individual in their armies could discharge with fidelity and honour the superior offices of magistrate and consul, there are to be found in their annals many years marked by overthrows, or disgraced by the ill conduct, the oppression, and the wantonness of their generals. [Vid. Consul.] To the fame which their conquests and daily successes had gained abroad, the Romans were not a little indebted for their gradual rise to superiority; and to this may be added the policy of the census, which every fifth year told them their actual strength, and how many citizens were able to bear arms. And indeed it was no small satisfaction to a people who were continually making war to see, that in spite of all the losses which they might sustain in the field, the increase of the inhabitants of the city was prodigious, and almost incredible, and had Romulus lived after the battle of Actium, he would have been persuaded with difficulty that above four millions of inhabitants were contained within those walls, which in the most flourishing period of his reign could scarce muster an army of 3000 infantry, and 300 horse. But when Rome had flourished under the consular government for about 120 years, and had beheld with pleasure the conquests of her citizens over the neighbouring states and cities, which, according to a Roman historian, she was ashamed to recollect in the summit of her power, an irruption of the barbarians of Gaul rendered her very existence precarious, and her name was nearly extinguished. The valour of an injured individual, [Vid Camillus,] saved it from destruction, yet not before its buildings and temples were reduced to ashes. This celebrated event, which gave the appellation of another founder of Rome to Camillus, has been looked upon as a glorious era to the Romans. The huts and cottages which Romulus had erected, and all his successors repaired, were totally consumed, and when the city arose again from its ruins, the streets were enlarged, convenience as well as order was observed, taste and regularity were consulted, and the poverty, ignorance, and rusticity of the Romans, seemed to be extinguished with their old habitations. But no sooner were they freed from the fears of their barbarian invaders, than they turned their arms against those states which refused to acknowledge their superiority, or yield their independence. Their wars with Pyrrhus and the Tarentines, displayed their character in a different view; if they before had fought for freedom and independence, they now drew their sword for glory; and here we may see them conquered in the field, and yet refusing to grant that peace, for which their conqueror himself had sued. The advantages they gained from their battles with Pyrrhus, were many. The Roman name became known in Greece, Sicily, and Africa, and in losing or gaining a victory, the Romans were enabled to examine the manœuvres, observe the discipline, and contemplate the order and the encampments, of those soldiers whose friends and ancestors had accompanied Alexander the Great in the conquests of Asia. Italy became subjected to the Romans at the end of the war with the Tarentines, and that period of time has been called the second age, or the adolescence of the Roman empire. After this memorable era they tried their strength not only with distant nations, but also upon a new element; and in the long wars which they waged against Carthage, they acquired territory, and obtained the sovereignty of the sea, and though Annibal for sixteen years kept them in continual alarms, hovered round their gates, and destroyed their armies almost before their walls, yet they were doomed to conquer, [Vid. Punicum bellum,] and soon to add the kingdom of Macedonia, [Vid. Macedonicum bellum] and the provinces of Asia, [Vid. Mithridaticum bellum.] to their empire. But while we consider the Romans as a nation subduing their neighbours by war, their manners, their counsels, and their pursuits at home are not to be forgotten. To be warriors was their profession; their assemblies in the Campus Martius were a meeting of armed men, and very properly denominated an army. Yet while their conquests were so extensive abroad, we find them torn by factions at home; and so far was the resentment of the poorer citizens carried, that we see the enemy at the gates of the city, while all are unwilling to take up arms and to unite in the defence of their common liberty. The senators and nobles were ambitious of power, and endeavoured to retain in their hands that influence which had been exercised with so much success, and such cruelty, by their monarchs. This was the continual occasion of tumults and sedition. The people were jealous of their liberty. The oppression of the nobles irritated them, and the stripes to which they were too often exposed without mercy, was often productive of revolutions. The plebeians, though originally the poorest and most contemptible citizens of an indigent nation, whose food in the first ages of the empire was only bread and salt, and whose drink was water, soon gained rights and privileges by their opposition. Though really slaves they became powerful in the state; one concession from the patricians produced another, and when their independence was boldly asserted by their tribunes, they were admitted to share in the highest offices of the state, and the laws which forbad the intermarriage of plebeian and patrician families, were repealed, and the meanest peasant could by valour and fortitude be raised to the dignity of dictator and consul. It was not till these privileges were obtained by the people from the senate, that Rome began to enjoy internal peace and tranquillity, her battles were then fought with more vigour, her soldiers were more animated, and her sovereignty was more universally established. But supreme power lodged in the hands of a factious and ambitious citizen becomes too often dangerous. The greatest oppression and tyranny took place of subordination and obedience; and from those causes proceeded the unparalleled slaughter and effusion of blood under a Sylla and a Marius. It has been justly observed, that the first Romans conquered their enemies by valour, temperance, and fortitude; their moderation also and their justice were well known among their neighbours, and not only private possessions, but even mighty kingdoms and empires, were left in their power, to be distributed among a family or to be ensured in the hand of a successor. They were also chosen umpires to decide quarrels, but in this honourable office they consulted their own interest, they artfully supported the weaker side, that the more powerful might be reduced, and gradually become their prey. Under J Cæsar and Pompey, the rage of civil war was carried to unprecedented excess; it was not merely to avenge a private injury, but it was a contest for the sovereignty; and though each of the adversaries wore the mask of pretended sincerity, and professed himself to be the supporter of the republic, no less than the abolition of freedom and the public liberty was the aim. What Julius began, his adopted son achieved: the ancient spirit of national independence was extinguished at Rome; and after the battle of Actium, the Romans seemed unable to govern themselves without the assistance of a chief, who under the title of imperator, an appellation given to every commander by his army after some signal victory, reigned with as much power and as much sovereignty as another Tarquin. Under their emperors, the Romans lived a luxurious and indolent life they had long forgot to appear in the field, and their wars were left to be waged by mercenary troops, who fought without spirit or animosity, and who were ever ready to yield to him who bought their allegiance and fidelity with the greatest sums of money. Their leaders themselves were not the most prudent or the most humane, the power which they had acquired by bribery was indeed precarious, and among a people, where not only the highest offices of the state, but even the imperial purple itself are exposed to sale, there cannot be expected much happiness or tranquillity in the palace of the emperor. The reigns of the successors of Augustus were distinguished by variety; one was the most abandoned and profligate of men, whom his own vices and extravagance hurried out of the world, while his successor, perhaps the most clement, just, and popular of princes, was sacrificed in the midst of his guards and attendants by the dagger of some offended favourite or disappointed eunuch. Few indeed were the emperors of Rome whose days were not shortened by poison, or the sword of an assassin. If one for some time had the imprudence to trust himself in the midst of a multitude at last to perish by his own credulity, the other consulted his safety, but with no better success, in the innumerable chambers of his palace, and changed every day, to elude discovery, the place of his retirement. After they had been governed by a race of princes, remarkable for the variety of their characters, the Roman possessions were divided into two distinct empires, by the enterprising Constantine, A.D 328. Constantinople became the seat of the eastern empire, and Rome remained in the possession of the western emperors, and continued to be the capital of their dominions. In the year 800 of the Christian era, Rome with Italy was delivered by Charlemagne, the then emperor of the west, into the hands of the Pope, who still continues to hold the sovereignty, and to maintain his independence under the name of the Ecclesiastical States. — The original poverty of the Romans has often been disguised by their poets and historians, who wished it to appear that a nation who were masters of the world, had had better beginning, than to be a race of shepherds and robbers. Yet it was to this simplicity they were indebted for their successes. Their houses were originally destitute of every ornament, they were made with unequal boards, and covered with mud, and these served them rather as a shelter against the inclemency of the seasons, than for relaxation and ease. Till the age of Pyrrhus, they despised riches, and many salutary laws were enacted to restrain luxury and to punish indolence. They observed great temperance in their meals; young men were not permitted to drink wine till they had attained their thirtieth year, and it was totally forbidden to women. Their national spirit was supported by policy; the triumphal procession of a conqueror along the streets amidst the applause of thousands, was well calculated to promote emulation, and the number of gladiators who were regularly introduced not only in public games and spectacles, but also at private meetings, served to cherish their fondness for war, while it steeled their hearts against the calls of compassion, and when they could gaze with pleasure upon wretches whom they forcibly obliged to murder one another, they were not inactive in the destruction of those whom they considered as inveterate foes or formidable rivals in the field. In their punishments, civil as well as military, the Romans were strict and rigorous; a deserter was severely whipped and sold as a slave, and the degradation from the rank of a soldier and dignity of a citizen was the most ignominious stigma which could be affixed upon a seditious mutineer. The transmarine victories of the Romans proved at last the ruin of their innocence and bravery. They grew fond of the luxury of the Asiatics; and conquered by the vices and indolence of those nations whom they had subdued, they became as effeminate and as dissolute as their captives. Marcellus was the first who introduced a taste for the fine arts among his countrymen. The spoils and treasures that were obtained in the plunder of Syracuse and Corinth, rendered the Romans partial to elegant refinement and ornamental equipage. Though Cato had despised philosophy, [Vid. Carneades.] and declared that war was the only profession of his countrymen, the Romans, by their intercourse with the Greeks, soon became fond of literature; and though they had once banished the sophists of Athens from their city, yet they beheld with rapture their settlement among them in the principal towns of Italy, after the conquest of Achaia. They soon after began to imitate their polished captives, and to cultivate poetry with success. From the valour of their heroes and conquerors, indeed, the sublimest subjects were offered to the genius of their poets; but of the little that remains to celebrate the early victories of Rome, nothing can be compared to the nobler effusions of the Augustan age. Virgil has done so much for the Latin name that the splendour and the triumphs of his country are forgotten for a while, when we are transported in the admiration of the majesty of his numbers, the elegant delicacy of his expressions, and the fire of his muse; and the applauses given to the lyric powers of Horace, the softness of Tibullus, the vivacity of Ovid; and to the superior compositions of other respectable poets, shall be unceasing so long as the name of Rome excites our reverence and our praises, and so long as genius, virtue, and abilities are honoured amongst mankind. Though they originally rejected with horror a law which proposed the building of a public theatre, and the exhibition of plays, like the Greeks, yet the Romans soon proved favourable to the compositions of their countrymen. Livius was the first dramatic writer of consequence at Rome, whose plays began to be exhibited A. U. C. 514. After him Nævius and Ennius wrote for the stage; and in a more polished period Plautus, Terence, Cæcilius, and Afranius, claimed the public attention and gained the most unbounded applause. Satire did not make its appearance at Rome till one hundred years after the introduction of comedy, and as celebrated was Lucilius in this kind of writing, that he was called the inventor of it. In historical writing the progress of the Romans was slow and inconsiderable, and for many years they employed the pen of foreigners to compile their annals, till the superior abilities of a Livy were made known. – In their worship and sacrifices the Romans were uncommonly superstitious, the will of the gods was consulted on every occasion, and no general marched to an expedition without the previous assurance from the augurs, that the omens were propitious, and his success almost indubitable. Their sanctuaries were numerous, they raised altars not only to the gods, who, as they supposed, presided over their city, but also to the deities of conquered nations, as well as to the different passions and virtues. There were no less than 420 temples at Rome, crowded with statues, the priests were numerous, and each divinity had a particular college of sacerdotal servants. Their wars were declared in the most awful and solemn manner, and prayers were always offered in the temples for the prosperity of Rome, when a defeat had been sustained, or a victory won. The power of fathers over their children was very extensive, and indeed unlimited; they could sell them or put them to death at pleasure, without the forms of a trial, or the interference of the civil magistrate. Many of their ancient families were celebrated for the great men whom they had produced, but the vigorous and interested part they took in the government of the republic exposed them often to danger; and some have observed that the Romans sunk into indolence and luxury when the Cornelii, the Fabii, the Æmylii, the Marcelli, &c, who had so often supported their spirit and led them to victory, had been extinguished in the bloody wars of Marius and of the two triumvirates. When Rome was become powerful, she was distinguished from other cities by the flattery of her neighbours and citizens; a form of worship was established to her as a deity, and temples were raised in her honour, not only in the city but in the provinces. The goddess Roma was represented like Minerva, all armed and sitting on a rock, holding a pike in her hand, with her head covered with a helmet, and a trophy at her feet. Liv. 1, &c.—*Cato de R. ROMANI, the inhabitants of Rome. Vid. Roma.

ROMULA, a name given to the fig tree under which Romulus and Remus were found. Ovid. Fast. 2, 412.

ROMULIDÆ, a patronymic given to the Roman people from Romulus, their first king, and the founder of their city. Virg. Æn. 8, 638.

ROMULUS, a son of Mars, and Ilia, grandson of Numitor king of Alba, was born at the same birth with Remus. These two children were thrown into the Tiber by order of Amulius, who usurped the crown of his brother Numitor; but they were preserved, and, according to Florus, the river stopped its course, and a she-wolf came and fed them with her milk, till they were found by Faustulus, one of the king's shepherds who educated them as his own children When they knew their real origin, the twins, called Romulus and Remus, put Amulius to death and restored the crown to their grandfather Numitor. They afterwards undertook to build a city, and to determine which of the two brothers should have the management of it, they had recourse to omens and the flight of birds Remus went to mount Aventine, and Romulus to mount Palatine Remus saw first a flight of six vultures, and soon after, Romulus, twelve; and therefore, as his number was greater, he began to lay the foundations of the city, hopeful that it would become a warlike and powerful nation, as the birds from which he had received the omen were fond of prey and slaughter. Romulus marked with a furrow the place where he wished to rect the walls; but their slenderness was ridiculed by Remus, who leaped over them with the greatest contempt. This irritated Romulus, and Remus was immediately put to death, either by the hand of his brother or one of the workmen. When the walls were built, the city was without inhabitants, but Romulus, by making an asylum of a sacred grove, soon collected a multitude of fugitives, foreigners, and criminals, whom he received as his lawful subjects Yet, however numerous these might be, they were despised by the neighbouring inhabitants, and none were willing to form matrimonial connections with them. But Romulus obtained by force what was denied to his petitions. The Romans celebrated games in honour of the god Consus, and forcibly carried away all the females who had assembled there to be spectators of these unusual exhibitions. These violent measures offended the neighbouring nations; they made war against the ravishers with various success, till at last they entered Rome, which had been betrayed to them by one of the stolen virgins A violent engagement was begun in the middle of the Roman forum; but the Sabines were conquered; or, according to Ovid, the two enemies laid down their arms when the women had rushed between the two armies, and by their tears and entreaties raised compassion in the bosoms of their parents and husbands. The Sabines left their original possessions and came to live in Rome, where Tatius, their king shared the sovereign power with Romulus The introduction of the Sabines into the city of Rome was attended with the most salutary consequences, and the Romans, by pursuing this plan, and admitting the conquered nations among their citizens, rendered themselves more powerful and more formidable. Afterwards Romulus divided the lands which he had obtained by conquest; one part was reserved for religious uses, to maintain the priests, to erect temples, and to consecrate altars; the other was appropriated for the expenses of the state; and the third part was equally distributed among his subjects, who were divided into three classes or tribes The most aged and experienced, to the number of 100, were also chosen, whom the monarch might consult in matters of the highest importance, and from their age they were called senators, and from their authority patres The whole body of the people was also distinguished by the name of patricians and plebeians patron and client, who by mutual interest were induced to preserve the peace of the state, and to promote the public good. Some time after Romulus disappeared as he was giving instructions to the senators, and the eclipse of the sun, which happened at that time, was favourable to the rumour which asserted that the king had been taken up to heaven 714 B C. after a reign of thirty-nine years. This was further confirmed by J. Proculus, one of the senators, who solemnly declared that as he returned from Alba, he had seen Romulus in a form above human, and that he had directed him to tell the Romans to pay him divine honours under the name of Quirinus, and to assure them that their city was doomed one day to become the capital of the world. This report was immediately credited, and the more as all the senators dreaded the resentment of the people, who suspected them of having offered him violence. A temple was raised to him, and a regular priest, called Flamen Quirinalis, was appointed to offer him sacrifices. Romulus was ranked by the Romans among the twelve great gods, and it is not to be wondered that he received such distinguished honours, when the Romans considered him as the founder of their city and empire, and the son of the god of war. He is generally represented like his father, so much that it is difficult to distinguish them. The fable of the two children of Rhea Sylvia being nourished by a she wolf, arose from Lupa, Faustulus's wife, having brought them up. (Vid. Acca.) *Dionys. ROMULUS SYLVIUS, a king of Alba —— Momyllus Augustulus, the last of the emperors of the western empire of Rome His country was conquered A D 476, by the Heruli, under Odoacer, who assumed the name of king of Italy

ROMUS a son of Æneas, by Lavinia. Some suppose that he was the founder of Rome

ROSCIA LEX de theatris, by L Roscius Otho the tribune, A U C. 685 It required that none should sit in the first fourteen seats of the theatre, if they were not in possession of 400 sestertia, which was the fortune required to be a Roman knight.

ROSCIANUM, a fortified port on the coast of Bruttium, below Sybaris. It is now Rossano

ROSCIUS, Q. a Roman actor of great fame, was a native of Gaul He was contemporary at Rome with the celebrated actor Æsopus® So great were his talents for the stage, and such was the degree of perfection to which he carried his art, that a complete master in any other art was popularly called the Roscius of it. Roscius was not less esteemed for his morals and conduct than admired for his professional talents. Cicero, in defending him from a pecuniary action brought against him by C. Fannius, after stating the vast profits he gained and might gain by his acting, says that he was liberal and munificent even before he was rich, and that for ten years he had refused the public compensation of his labours, and yet continued to serve the Roman people. He is said not to have been favoured by nature in his features and to have had some obliquity of vision, yet his speech and action were so pleasing that he had no occasion to use a mask. The greatest men in the state were his intimate friends, and his loss was universally lamented. His death took place at Rome, B. C. 62. He composed a parallel between theatrical and oratorical action, which is lost. Horat. Ep. 2, 1.—Quintil. — Cic. pro Planc. in Orat. 3. de Div. 1, &c. Tusc 3, &c.—Plut. in Cic.——Sextus, a rich citizen of Ameria, murdered in the dictatorship of Sylla. His son, of the same name, was accused of the murder, and eloquently defended by Cicero, in an oration still extant, A. U. C. 673. Cic. pro S Roscio Amer.——Otho, a tribune who made a law to discriminate the knights from the common people at public spectacles. Vid Roscia Lex.

ROTOMAGUS, a city of Gallia Lugdunensis, at a later period the metropolis of Lugdunensis Secunda. It is now Rouen.

ROXANA, a Persian woman, taken prisoner by Alexander. The conqueror became enamoured of her, and married her. She behaved with great cruelty after Alexander's death, and she was at last put to death by Cassander's order. She was daughter of Darius, or, according to others, of Oxartes one of his satraps. Curt. 8, 4. 10, 6.—Plut. in Alex.——A wife of Mithridates the Great, who poisoned herself.

ROXOLANI. Vid. Rhoxolani.

RUBEAS Promontorium, a promontory mentioned by Pytheas, and supposed by many to be the same with the North Cape, but shown by Mannert to correspond rather to the northern extremity of Gotland. Plin. 4, 13.

RUBI, now Ruvo, a town of Apulia, between Canusium and Butuntum. The inhabitants were called Rubustini, and Rubitini. Plin. 3, 11. —Horat. Sat. 1, 5. 94.

RUBICON, a small stream of Italy, falling into the Adriatic a little to the north of Ariminum, and forming in part the northern boundary of Italia Propria. It was on this last account that it was forbidden the Roman generals to pass the Rubicon with an armed force, under the most dreadful imprecations; for in violating this injunction they would enter on the immediate territory of the republic, and would be in effect declaring war upon their country. Cæsar crossed this stream with his army at the commencement of the civil war and harangued his troops at Ariminum. When Augustus subsequently included Gallia Cisalpina within the limits of Italy, the Rubicon sank in importance; and in modern times it is difficult to ascertain the position of the true stream. D' Anville makes it correspond with a current which, formed of three brooks, is called at its mouth Fiumicino Lucan. 1 185 et 213. Cic. Phil. 6, 3. - Strab. 5.— Plin. 3, 15.

RUBIENUS LAPPA, a tragic poet in the age of Juvenal, conspicuous as much for his great genius as his poverty. Juv. 7, 72.

RUFFINUS, a general in Gaul in the reign of Vitellius, &c. Tacit. H. 2, 94.

RUFFUS CRISPINUS, an officer of the pretorian guards under Claudius. He was banished by Agrippina for his attachment to Britannicus and Octavius, the sons of Messalina, and put himself to death. His wife Poppæa Sabina, by whom he had a son called Rufinus Crispinus, afterwards married Nero. Tacit. Hist. 13, 42. 16, 17.

RUFIANA, a town of Gaul, now Rufach, in Alsace.

RUFILIUS, a Roman ridiculed by Horace, Sat. 2, 27, for his effeminacy.

RUFINUS, a minister of state to the emperors Theodosius and Arcadius, and a native of Gaul. He was naturally vindictive and cruel, and is supposed to have stimulated Theodosius to the dreadful massacre of Thessalonica. After the death of this monarch, he succeeded to absolute authority over the eastern empire in the reign of Arcadius. He soon, however, fell beneath the power of Stilicho, general under Honorius in the western empire, and was put to death by the army. He is said to have aspired to the supreme authority.——An ecclesiastical writer, was born about the middle of the fourth century, at Concordia, in Italy. He became a priest in the monastery of Aquileia, where he contracted a friendship with St Jerome, whom he followed to the east, but while in Egypt, he suffered much persecution from the Arians. On his arrival in Palestine, he founded a monastery on mount Olivet, where he employed himself in translating Greek authors into Latin. His version of Origen gave such offence to his old acquaintance, Jerome, that he wrote bitterly against him, and Rufinus was cited to Rome by pope Anastasius, who condemned his translation. Rufinus then retired to Sicily, where he died, about 410. He wrote a defence of Origen, which, with his other works, was printed at Paris, in 1580, folio.

RUFRIUM, a town of Samnium, now Ruvo. Liv 8, 25.

RUFUS, a Latin historian. [Vid. Quintus Curtius Rufus.]——One of the ancestors of Sylla, degraded from the rank of a senator because ten pounds weight of gold were found in his house.——A poet of Ephesus in the reign of Trajan. He wrote six books on simples, now lost.

RUGII, a people of Germany, on the coast of the Sinus Codanus, between the Vindrus, or Oder, and the Vistula, and situate to the west of the Gothones. They were in possession of the isle of Rugia, now Rugen, where the goddess Hertha was worshipped with peculiar reverence, Tacit. de Germ. 43.

RUFILIUS, an officer surnamed Rex, for his authoritative manners. He was proscribed by Augustus, and fled to Brutus. Horat. Sat. 1, 7.——Rubilius, a consul A. U. C. 631. He was severe against the faction of the Gracchi, and put an end to the servile war in Sicily, and introduced wholesome regulations for the government of that island. Flor. 3, 19.—Liv. 59.

RUFICUS, L. JUN. RAULENUS, a man put to death by Domitian. He was the friend and preceptor of Pliny the younger, who praises his abilities; and he is likewise commended by Tacitus, H. 16, 26.– Plin. Ep. 1, 14.– Suet. in Dom.

RUTENI, a people of Gaul, now Rouergue in Guienne. Cæs B G 1, 7.

RUTILIUS, Rufus, P a Roman consul in the age of Sylla, celebrated for his virtues and writings. He refused to comply with the requests of his friends because they were unjust. When Sylla had banished him from Rome he retired to Smyrna, amidst the acclamations and praises of the people; and when some of his friends wished him to be recalled home by means of a civil war, he severely reprimanded them, and said, that he wished rather to see his country blush at his exile, than to plunge it into distress by his return. He was the first who taught the Roman soldiers the principles of fencing, and by thus mixing dexterity with valour, rendered their attacks more certain, and more irresistible. During his banishment he employed his time in study, and wrote a history of Rome in Greek, and an account of his own life in Latin, besides many other works. Ovid. Past 6, 565.—Seneca, de Benef—Cic. in Brut de Orat. 1, 53 Val Max. 2, 3. 6, 4.—Paterc. 2, 9 ——Lupus, a rhetorician, a treatise of whose, in two books, de Figuris Sententiarum et Elocutionis, still remains. The period when he flourished is uncertain. The work of Ruthius was edited by Ruhnken, L. Bat. 1768, 8vo.——Numatianus, a Latin poet, who was prefect of Rome about A. D 414. He wrote a description of Gaul, under the title of Itinerarium, which was discovered in a monastery in 1494, and printed in 1582. It is also in the Poetæ Latini Minores.

RUTUBA, now la Rotta, a river of Liguria, falling from the Apennines into the Mediterranean. Lucan 2, 422.

RUTULI, a people of Latium, along the coast below the mouth of the Tiber. They were a small community, who, though perhaps originally distinct from the Latini, became subsequently a part of that nation. Their chief city was Ardea, and Turnus was their prince, according to the fable of the Æneid, when the Trojans arrived in Italy. Vid. Ardea, Latium, Turnus RUTUPIÆ, a harbour on the coast of Britain, celebrated for its oysters and as the general landing-place from Gaul. It is generally considered as corresponding to Richborough, though D'Anville is in favour of Sandwich. Lucan. 6, 67.—Juv. 4, 141.

SABA, the capital of the Sabæi, in Arabia Felix, situate on a rising ground, in the interior of the country, and in a north-eastern direction from the harbour of Pudum, (Dejeam) It corresponds with the modern Saade. Vid Sabæi.

SABACHUS, or SABACON, a king of Æthiopia, who invaded Egypt and reigned there, after the expulsion of king Amasis. After a reign of 50 years he was terrified by a dream, and retired into his own kingdom. Herod. 2 137, &c.

SABÆI, a people of Arabia Felix, who were thought to be more wealthy than any other nation not only of Arabia but of the whole known world. Their country is called by the orientalists the south country, and in the scriptures its queen is called the queen of the south; she is said to have come from the uttermost parts of the earth, to hear the wisdom of Solomon, from her dominions lying at the southern extremity of the then known world. The chief city of the Sabæi was Sheba, so named after Sheba, the grandson of Cush; it is sometimes called Saba in the profane authors, or otherwise Mariaba a word signifying metropolis in the language of the country. It was here that the vast wealth was seen, of which they had become possessed, and which has led some to suppose that their territory was the Ophir of the bible, from which Solomon fetched great quantities of gold: the length of time, however, employed in the voyage seems to render it probable that Ophir was much more distant, possibly in the island of Sumatra. The winds which blew from the country round Sheba were laden with the smell of such an exquisite variety of spices, that their fragrance was quite overpowering and not to be described. 1 Kings, 1, 13 —2 Chron 9, 1 —12 —Matt. 12, 42 Isa 11, 31.—Strab 16.—*Virg. SABATE, a town of Etruria, north east of Cære, and not far from the site of the present Bracciano It was in the immediate vicinity of a lake, called from it the Lacus Sabatinus Columell 8, 16

SABATINI, a people of Campania, who derived their name from the small river Sabatus, that flowed through their territory. Liv. 36, 38

SABATUS, a river rising in Campania, and flowing into Samnium where it joined the Calor, near Beneventum. It is now the Sabato.

SABAZIUS, a surname of Bacchus given him, according to some, by the Thracians, or, according to others, by the Phrygians. Schol. ad Arist. Vesp. 9.—Strab. 10 ——A surname of Jupiter whose worship was introduced at Rome under the emperors, though in vain attempted during the times of the republic, by Cornel. Hispallus, Val. Max 1 3.

SABBATA, or Sabbatha, the capital of the Chatramotitæ, in Arabia Felix which, from having been called Mariaba or the metropolis, has obtained its present name of Mareb. It was the great mart for the valuable productions of the surrounding country, which upon pain of death, were only allowed to be brought into the city by one particular gate; where, when a tithe of them had been given to the god Sabis, they were permitted to be sold.

SABELLI. Vid. Samnites.

SABINA, JULIA, a Roman matron, who married Adrian by means of Plotina the wife of Trajan. She is celebrated for her private as well as public virtues Adrian treated her with the greatest asperity, though he had received from her the imperial purple: and the empress was so sensible of his unkindness, that she boasted in his presence that she had disdained to make him a father, lest his children should become more odious or more tyrannical than he himself was. The behaviour of Sabina at last so exasperated Adrian that he poisoned her, or according to some, obliged her to destroy herself. The emperor at that time laboured under a mortal disease, and therefore he was the more encouraged to sacrifice Sabina to his resentment, that she might not survive him Divine honours were paid to her memory. She died after she had been married 38 years to Adrian, A. D. 138.

SABINI, one of the most ancient people of Italy, whose territory was bounded on the west by the Tiber, on the north by the Nar, on the east by Picenum, and on the south by the Anio. The Sabini were probably descendants of the Umbri; they are said to have derived their name from the deity Sabus or Sabinus, their leader or progenitor. They were remarkable for their bravery and hardihood, as well as for their gravity and purity of manners; they were also celebrated for their incantations, and knowledge of herbs. They were said by some to have been the first people who took up arms against the Romans, to avenge the rape of their women, but Livy mentions the war with the Caninenses, Crustumini, and Antemnates, as preceding that with the Sabines. On that occasion, their king Tatius left his possessions and joined Romulus in the regal power, whilst his subjects, the inhabitants of Cures, were incorporated with the Roman citizens, after this union the two nations were indiscriminately called Quirites. In the reign of Hostilius, the third king of Rome, the Sabini who had not left their ancient territory went to war with the Romans, and after having been through a series of years repeatedly defeated, were at last completely subjected to the Romans by the consul Curius Dentatus, B. C. 292. Strab. 5.—Dionys. 2, 51.—Plin. 3, 12. Liv. 1, 9 et 18.—Flor. 1, 1. 3, 18.—Sil. Ital. 8, 424. Virg. G. 2, 532.

SABINIANUS, a general who revolted in Africa, in the reign of Gordian, and was defeated soon after, A. D. 240.

SABINUS, Aulus, a Roman poet, the friend and contemporary of Ovid, and to whom the last six of the heroic epistles of that bard are generally ascribed by commentators. These are, Paris to Helen, Helen to Paris, Leander to Hero, Hero to Leander, Acontius to Cydippe, and Cydippe to Acontius. He was the author also of several answers to the epistles of Ovid, as Ulysses to Penelope, Æneas to Dido, &c., and likewise of a work on Days, which his death prevented him from completing. The last mentioned production is thought by some to have given Ovid the idea of his Fasti.— Julius, an officer among the Lingones in Gaul, who, by pretending to be descended from Julius Cæsar, gained popularity, and proclaimed himself emperor in the beginning of Vespasian's reign. He was soon after defeated in a battle; and to escape from the conqueror he hid himself in a subterraneous cave, with two faithful domestics, where he continued unseen for nine successive years. His wife Empona found out his retreat, and spent her time with him, till her frequent visits to the cave discovered the place of his concealment. He was dragged before Vespasian, and by his orders put to a cruel death, though his friends interested themselves in his cause, and his wife endeavoured to raise the emperor's pity, by showing him the twins whom she had brought forth in their subterraneous retreat. Tacit. H. 4, 55.—Titius, a Roman senator shamefully accused and condemned by Sejanus. His body, after execution, was dragged through the streets of Rome, and treated with the greatest indignities. His dog constantly followed the body, and when it was thrown into the Tiber, the faithful animal plunged in after it, and was drowned. Plin. 8, 40.—— Poppæus, a Roman consul, who presided above twenty-four years over Mœsia, and obtained a triumph for his victories over the barbarians. He was a great favourite of Augustus and of Tiberius. Tacit. Ann. 1, 80. 4, 46. 6, 39.—— Flavius, a brother of Vespasian, killed by the populace. He was well known for his fidelity to Vitellius. He commanded in the Roman armies thirty-five years, and was governor of Rome for twelve. Tacit. Hist. 1, 46. 2, 63. 3, 74.

SABIS, a river of Gallia Belgica, rising in the territory of the Nervii, and falling into the Mosa (Maese) at Namurium (Namur) in the territory of the Aduatici. It is now the Sambre. Cæs. B. G. 2, 16 et 18.

SABRATA, a city of Africa, in the Regio Syrtica, west of Oea and east of the Syrtis Minor. It was originally founded by the Tyrians, but subsequently enlarged and beautified by the Romans, who raised it to the rank of a colony. It was the birthplace of Flavia Domitilla, the consort of Vespasian, and mother of Titus and Domitian, to which honour it owed much of the favour bestowed upon it. It is now Sabart, or Tripoli Vecchia. Sil Ital. 3, 256.—Plin. 5, 4.

SABRINA, now the Severn in England.

SABURANUS, an officer of the prætorian guards. When he was appointed to this office by the emperor Trajan, the prince presented him with a sword, saying, "Use this weapon in my service as long as my commands are just; but turn it against my own breast, whenever I become cruel or malevolent."

SACADAS, a musician and poet of Argos, who obtained three several times, the prize at the Pythian games. Plut de Mus. — Paus. 6, 14.

SACÆ, a name given by the Persians to all the more northern nations of Asia but which at a subsequent period designated a particular people, whose territory was bounded on the west by Sogdiana, north and east by Scythia, and south by Bactriana and the chain of Imaus. Their dominions therefore correspond in some degree to Little Bukaria, and the adjacent districts. The Sacæ had no towns, but lived a romantic life, dwelling sometimes in caverns, and sometimes in forests. They were a brave people, and possessed sufficient strength to repel Cyrus when he made his attack upon them. Herod. 7, 9.—Mela, 3, 7. Plin. 6, 17.—Amm. Marcel. 23, 6.

SACER MONS, a mountain near Rome. Vid. Mons Sacer.

SACER PORTUS, or SACRI PORTUS, a place in Italy, near Præneste, famous for a battle that was fought there between Sylla and Marius, in which the former obtained the victory. Patere. 2, 26.—Lucan. 2, 134.

SACRA INSULA, an island in the Tiber, not far from its mouth, formed by the separation of the two branches of that river. It was sacred to Æsculapius, who, it was said, had come there in the form of a serpent from Epidaurus. Procop. B. G. 1, 26.

SACRA VIA, a celebrated street of Rome, where a treaty of peace and alliance was made between Romulus and Tatius. It led from the amphitheatre to the capitol, by the temple of the goddess of peace, and the temple of Cæsar. The triumphal processions passed through it to go to the capitol. Horat. Od. 4, 2. Sat. 1, 9.—Liv. 2, 13.—Cic. Planc. 7. Att. Ep. 4, 4.

SACRATA LEX militaris, A. U. C. 411, by the dictator Valerius Corvus, enacted that the name of no soldier which had been entered in the muster-roll, should be struck out but by his consent, and that no person who had been a military tribune should act as auctor ordinum.

SACRI PORTUS. Vid. Sacer portus

SACRUM BELLUM, a name given to the war carried on concerning the temple of Delphi. The first began B. C. 448, and in it the Athenians and Lacedæmonians were auxiliaries on opposite sides. The second war began 357 B. C., and finished nine years after by Philip of Macedonia, who destroyed all the cities of the Phocians. [Vid. Phocis.]——Promontorium a promontory of Spain, now Cape St Vincent, called by Strabo the most westerly part of the earth It was called Sacrum, because the ancients believed this to be the place where the sun at his setting plunged his chariot into the sea. Mela, 2, 6. Plin. 4, 22 ——Another promontory, in Lycia, between the mouth of the river Lymirus and the city of Olympia. It is now called Cape Kelidonia. Plin. 5, 27.—— Another, at the northern extremity of Corsica, now Cape Corso.

SADYATES, one of the Mermnadæ who reigned in Lydia twelve years after his father Gyges. He made war against the Milesians for six years. Herod. 1, 16, &c

SAETABIS a river of Spain, between the Iberus and the Pillars of Hercules. It is now the Montesa Mela, 2, 6.——A city of Spain, in the territory of the Contestani, and situate on a height, just below the river Sucro, or Xucar It was famed for its linen manufacture. Its modern name is S. Felype Xativa. Plin. 19, 2.—Catull 12, 14.—Sil. Ital. 3, 373.

SAGANA, a woman acquainted with magic and enchantments. Horat Epod. 5, 25.

SAGARIS. Vid Sangaris

SAGRA, or Sagras, a river of Magna Græcia, in the territory of the Brutii, falling into the Sinus Tarentinus, a short distance above the Zephyrian promontory It was on the banks of the Sagras that the memorable overthrow of the Crotoniates took place, when they were defeated by a force of 10,000 Locrians, with a small body of Rhegians. Among other marvellous circumstances connected with this event, it was reported, that the issue of the battle was known at Olympia the very day on which it was fought. The Sagras is now called Alaro. Strab. 6.—Sic de Nat. D 2, 2.—Justin. 20, 2.

SAGUNTUM, now Murviedro, a city of Hispania Terraconensis, north of Valentia, and some distance below the mouth of the Iberus. It was situate on a rising ground, about 1000 paces from the shore. It was originally founded by colonists from Zacynthus, who were afterwards joined by some Rutulians from Ardea. It was famed for its beautiful clay, from which cups were made. The inhabitants were faithfully attached to the Romans, and withstood a siege of eight months against Hannibal, till, urged by famine, they destroyed themselves and their valuables in a general conflagration, rather than fall into the hands of their enemy, B. C. 219. This siege was the cause of the second Punic war. Liv. 21, 7. 8, 14. 24, 42.—Sil. Ital. 1, 291, &c.—Martial. 4, 46, &c.—Polyb 30 - Mela, 2, 6

SAIS, a city of Egypt, situate in the Delta, between the Sebennytic and Canopic arms of the Nile, and nearly due west from the city of Sebennytus. It was the most famous and important city in the Delta, and was reputed to have been the place where Osiris was buried. It derived much of its grandeur from having given birth to the last dynasty of the Pharaohs, whose tombs were erected in its famous temple of Minerva. It was also remarkable for a great festival held in honour of the goddess, as well as for the celebration of that splendid "feast of lamps," during which on the same night all the lamps of Egypt were seen burning. Its site agrees with that now called Sa. Herod. 2, 59 et 169.—Strab. 17.

SALAMIS, a daughter of the river Asopus, by Methone. Neptune became enamoured of her, and carried her to an island of the Ægean, which afterwards bore her name, and where she gave birth to a son called Cenebreus. Diod. 4, 72.—— An island in the Sinus Saronicus, opposite Eleusis and the coast of Attica, and said to have received its name from Salamis, a daughter of the Asopus It was also anciently called Sepras and Cychrea, from the heroes Sepyus and Cychreus, and Pityussa from its abounding in firs It had been already celebrated in the earliest period of Grecian history from the colony of the Æacidæ, who settled there before the siege of Troy. The possession of Salamis was disputed by the Athenians and Megareans, each party interpolating the poems of Homer to prove their right; it was, however, finally seized by the former people under Pisistratus, and was thenceforward always subject to them. It was here that the Persian fleet of Xerxes was so gloriously defeated by that of the Athenians, commanded by Themistocles, B. C. 480. In commemoration of this splendid victory, a trophy was erected on the promontory Cynosura, opposite the Piræus, the place which the oracle had foretold to the Athenians should be the scene of the defeat of their enemies. Salamis was the birth-place of Ajax Teucer, and Solon the lawgiver. Its modern name is Coulouri. Strab. 9. Plut in Solon — Herod 8, 56 et 83 —Paus. 1, 30 ——A city in the island of Cyprus, situate about the middle of the eastern side. It was founded by Teucer, son of Telamon, and called by him after Salamis his native island from which he had been banished by his father. It was a very important and powerful place, and gave name to the district Salaminia. It suffered much from an insurrection of the Jews in the time of Trajan, and still more during the reign of Constantius from an earthquake which completely destroyed the city, and killed most of its inhabitants, it was however, restored by the latter emperor, who called it Constantia. Salamis was especially sacred to Venus, hence surnamed Salaminia Horat. Od. 1, 7, 21.—Dod. Sic. 12, 3. 14, 98. 16 42.

SALAPIA, now Salpi, a city of Apulia, near the coast, above the river Aufidus, and between that river and the Salapina Palus. It was founded by the Rhodians, under a chief named Elpias. It was, at one time, the emporium of Arpi and was the place to which Hannibal withdrew after the battle of Cannæ Lucan 5, 377 - Strab. 6 et 14.—Liv. 24, 20. 26, 28.

SALARIA, a street and gate at Rome which led towards the country of the Sabines. It received the name of Salaria, because salt (sal) was generally conveyed to Rome that way Martial 4, 64.——A bridge called Salarius. was built four miles from Rome, through the Salarian gate on the river Anio.

SALASSI, a people of Gallia Cisalpina, in the north-western angle of that country, and at the foot of the Alps The main part of their territory lay chiefly, however, in a long valley which reached to the summits of the Graian and Pennine Alps, the Little and Great St Bernard. The Salassi harassed the Romans for a long time, and resisted their attacks till they were totally subdued by Terentius Varro, and sold as slaves. Their chief town was Augusta Prætoria, now Aosta built in honour of Augustus on the site of Varro's camp, and colonised by Prætorians. Strab. 4.—Dio Cass 1, 53.—Liv Epit 53.

SALEIUS BASSUS, a poet of great merit in the age of Domitian, yet pinched by poverty, though born of illustrious parents, and distinguished by purity of manners and integrity of mind. Juv 7, 80.—Quint. 10, 1.

SALENTINI, a people of Italy, in the territory of Iapygia. It was asserted, that they were a colony of Cretans, who, under the conduct of Idomeneus their king, had arrived thither in their wanderings after the capture of Troy. The Romans, under pretence of their having assisted Pyrrhus in his expedition into Italy, soon after invaded the territory of this insignificant people, and had no difficulty in taking the few towns which they possessed. The Salentini subsequently revolted, during the second Punic war, but they were again reduced, by the consul Claudius Nero. Strab. 6.—Virg. Æn. 3, 400. Flor.us. 1, 20.—Liv. 27, 26.

SALERNUM, now Salerno, a city of Campania, south-east of Neapolis, and near the shore of the Sinus Pæstanus. It was said to have been built by the Romans as a check upon the Picentini It became a Roman colony seven years after the conclusion of the second Punic war Horace was recommended by his physician to try the air of Salernum, for the benefit of his eyes. Liv. 34, 45. - Vell. Paterc. 1, 14.—Horat. Ep 1 15.

SALII, a college of priests at Rome, instituted in honour of Mars, and appointed by Numa to take care of the sacred shields called Ancilia B. C. 709. [Vid. Ancile.] They were twelve in number. Their chief was called præsul, who seems to have gone foremost in the procession; their principal musician, vates; and he who admitted new members, magister. Their number was afterwards doubled by Tullus Hostilius, after he had obtained a victory over the Fidenates, in consequence of a vow which he had made to Mars. The Salii were all of patrician families, and the office was very honourable. The first of March was the day on which the Salii observed their festivals in honour of Mars. They were generally dressed in a short scarlet tunic, of which only the edges were seen; they wore a large purple coloured belt about the waist, which was fastened with brass buckles. They had on their heads round bonnets with two corners stand ng up, and they wore in their right hand a small rod, and in their left a small buckler, one of the Ancilia, or shields of Mars. Lucan says that it hung from their neck. In the observation of their solemnity they first offered sacrifices, and afterwards went through the streets dancing in measured motions, sometimes all together, or at other times separately, while musical instruments were playing before them. They placed their body in different attitudes, and struck with their rods the shields which they held in their hands. They also sung hymns in honour of the gods, particularly of Mars, Jumo, Venus, and Minerva, and they were accompanied in the chorus by a certain number of virgins, habited like themselves, and called Saliæ. The Salii instituted by Numa were called Palatini, in contradistinction from the others, because they lived on mount Palatine, and offered their sacrifices there. Those that were added by Tullus were called Collini, Agonales, or Quirinales, from a mountain of the same name, where they had fixed their residence. Their name seems to have been derived a saliendo, or salvando, because during their festivals it was particularly requisite that they should leap and dance Their feasts and entertainments were uncommonly rich and sumptuous, whence dapes solares is proverbially applied to such repasts as are most splendid and costly. It was usual among the Romans when they declared war, for the Salii to shake their shields with great violence, as if to call upon the god Mars to come to their assistance. Liv 1, 20 - Varro. de L. L. 4, 15.—Ovid. Fast 3, 387 - Dionys 3.—Flor. 1, 2, &c.—Virg. Æn. 8, 285.——A German tribe of Frankish origin, whose original seat is not clearly ascertained. They first made their appearance on the Insula Batavorum, where they were conquered by Julian, afterwards, in the territory of the Chimavi, by the Meas or Mosæ. Amm Marcell. 17, 8. &c

SALLUSTIUS, CRISPUS, an eminent Roman historian, was born at Amiternum, in the country of the Sabines, B C. 85. He was educated at Rome, and was not less distinguished for his licentiousness than for his talents. It is recorded of him, that being detected in an adulterous intercourse, he was actually scourged by the hand of Milo, and obliged to pay a fine before he obtained his dismission. This extravagance and debauchery caused him to be expunged from the list of senators by the censors Appius Claudius and Calpurnius Piso. He was afterwards restored by Julius Cæsar, promoted to the dignities of quæstor and prætor, and nominated to the government of Numidia In this high office he enriched himself so much by pillage and rapine, that on his return to Rome he was enabled to build himself a magnificent villa, with extensive gardens, on the Quirinal hill, which even still retain the name of Sallust. He married Terentia, the divorced wife of Cicero, and from this circumstance, it has been said by some, arose an everlasting hatred between the orator and the historian; though, according to others, this enmity was occasioned by the defence which Cicero undertook to make for Milo in the case of Clodius. Sallust died in the 51st year of his age, 35 years before the Christian era. The vices of this man deserve a peculiar stigma, on account of their contrast with the rigid morality contained in his writings, which might lead the incautious reader to take him for a Cato. But while the man and the statesman must be ever held in contempt and abhorrence, the author has always been regarded as one of the ornaments of the age and country in which he flourished. He had composed a history of the Roman republic, from the death of Sylla to Catiline's conspiracy; of this nothing remains but a few fragments. His only compositions that have come to modern times, in a state of tolerable perfection, are the history of Catiline's conspiracy, and of the wars of Jugurtha, king of Numidia. In these works, which have met with uniform applause, the author is greatly admired for its elegance, the vigour, and the animation of his sentences; he everywhere displays a wonderful knowledge of the human heart, and paints with a most masterly hand the causes that gave rise to the great events which he relates. No one was better acquainted with the vices that prevailed in Italy, from his own practice of many of them; and no one seems to have been more severe against the follies of the age, and even those failings of which he not only stood guilty in the face of the world, but must have stood self-condemned. His descriptions are elegantly correct, and his harangues are nervous and animated, and, apparently, extremely well adapted to the character and different pursuits of the great men in whose mouths they are placed. By the modern it is agreed that the concise energy of the Latin language is nowhere displayed to more perfection than in the existing works of Sallust in which there is great skill shown in sketching the characters that come under his notice. By his contemporaries his style was criticised for an affectation of the use of old words, and an occasional obscurity, produced by the boldness of figure and excess of brevity. Notwithstanding this defect, if it were a defect, his reputation stood very high in Rome: Martial calls him "primus in Romana historia;" and Tacitus speaks of him as "rerum Romanarum florentissimus auctor." Though faithful in every other respect, he has not painted the character of Cicero with all the fidelity and accuracy which the reader claims from the historian; and in passing over in silence many actions which reflect the greatest honour on the first husband of Terentia, the rival of Cicero has disgraced himself, and rendered his compositions in some respects suspicious. The best editions of Sallust are that of Cortius, 4to. Lips. 1742; that of Havercamp, 2 vols. 4to. Amst. 1742; that of Gerlach, 2 vols. 4to. Basil 1823; and that of Kretschcr, 2 vols 8vo Lips. 1825 There are four English translations, one by Gordon, another by Rose, a third by Murphy, and a fourth by Steuart.——The nephew of the historian, by whom he was adopted. He is said to have imitated the moderation of Maecenas, and to have remained satisfied with the dignity of a Roman knight, when he could have made himself powerful by the favour of Augustus and of his successor Tiberius. Horace dedicated one of his odes to him. Tacit. Ann. 1, 6 – Plin. 34

——Secundus Promotus, a native of Gaul, and the intimate friend of the emperor Julian. He is remarkable for his integrity, and the soundness of his counsels. He was prefect of Gaul There is another "Secundus," sometimes confounded with Promotus, who was also a favourite of Julian, who made him prefect of the east. He conciliated the good graces of the Romans by the purity of his morals, and the excellence of his religious principles. After the death of Jovian he was universally named by the officers of the Roman empire to succeed to the imperial throne, but he declined the honour, pleading old age, and its attendant infirmities, as his excuse. The Romans would have invested his son with the imperial purple, but the father very wisely opposed so dangerous a situation, saying that he had not experience to support the dignity to which they would have elevated him

SALMACIS, a fountain near Halicarnassus in Caria, which was fabled to render effeminate all who drank of its waters. It was here that Hermaphroditus, according to the poets, underwent his strange metamorphosis Ovid. Met 4, 285. 15. 319. – Hygin. fab. 271.

SALMANTICA, a city of Hispania, in the north eastern angle of Lusitania. It is now Salamanca.

SALMÒNE, a city of Elis, of great antiquity, north-west of Olympia. It was said to have been founded by Salmoneus Strab 8

SALMONEUS, a king of Elis, son of Eolus and Enarette, who married Alcidice, by whom he had Tyro. He wished to be called a god, and to receive divine honours from his subjects, therefore, to imitate the thunder, he used to drive his chariot over a brazen bridge, and darted burning torches on every side, as if to imitate the lightning This impiety provoked Jupiter Salmoneus was struck with a thunderbolt, and placed in the infernal regions near his brother Sisyphus *Homer. SALMYDESSUS. Vid Halmydessus.

SALO, now Xalon, a river in Spain, falling into the Iberus. Mart 10, 20.

SALON, now Salona, the principal harbour of Dalmatia, and always considered as an important post by the Romans after their conquest of that country. Pliny styles it a colony, which is confirmed by various inscriptions. The name is sometimes written Salona and Salonæ. At Spalatro, about three miles from Salona, are to be seen the ruins of Diocletian's palace. Plin. 3, 22. – Cæs. B. C. 3, 9 Hirt. B. Alex. 43.

SALONINA, a celebrated matron who married the emperor Gallienus, and distinguished herself by her private as well as public virtues. She was the patroness of all the fine arts, and to her clemency, mildness, and benevolence, Rome was indebted some time for her peace and prosperity. She accompanied her husband in some of his expeditions, and often called him away from the pursuits of pleasure to make war against the enemies of Rome. She was put to death by the hands of the conspirators, who also assassinated her husband and family, about the year 268 of the Christian era.

SALONINUS, a son of Asinius Pollio. He received his name from the conquest of Salona by his father. Some suppose that he is the hero of Virgil's fourth eclogue, in which the return of the golden age is so warmly and beautifully anticipated.——P. Licinius Cornelius, a son of Gallienus, by Salonina, sent into Gaul, there to be taught the art of war. He remained there some time, till the usurper Posthumius arose and proclaimed himself emperor. Saloninus was upon this delivered up to his enemy, and put to death in the tenth year of his age.

SALVIANUS, a father of the church, who flourished about A. D. 440. He is supposed to have been a native of Gaul, and died at Massilia, at a very advanced age. Nothing of his remains, but eight books "De gubernatione Dei;" four books "Adversus Avaritiam," and nine epistles, printed by Baluzius, in 1663, 8vo.

SALVIUS, a flute player, saluted king by the rebellious slaves of Sicily in the age of Marius. He maintained for some time war against the Romans.

SALUS, the goddess of health at Rome, worshipped by the Greeks under the name of Hygeia. Luc. 9 et 10.

SALYES, a people of Gaul, extending from the Rhone nearly to the Alps, and from the Durantia, or Durance, to the sea. They were powerful opponents to the Greeks of Massilia. Liv. 5, 34.

SAMARA, a river of Gaul, now called the Somme. Vid. Samarobriva.

SAMARIA, the capital of the kingdom of Israel. It was situated on a hill which derived its name from Shemer, of whom it was purchased by Omri king of Israel, B. C. 921, who made it the seat of his government, and called it Samaria (Heb. Shomeron), from its former owner. By his successors it was greatly improved and fortified, and, after resisting the repeated attacks of the kings of Assyria, it was destroyed by Shalmaneser, B. C. 717, who reduced it to a heap of stones. Samaria seems to have risen again from its ruins during the reign of Alexander, B. C. 549, after whose death it was subject to the Egyptian and Syrian kings, until it was besieged, taken and razed to the ground by the high priest Hyrcanus, B. C. 129 or 130. It was afterwards wholly rebuilt, and considerably enlarged by Herod, surnamed the Great, who gave it the name of Sebaste, and erected a temple there in honour of the emperor Augustus Cæsar. It is still called Sebaste, or Kalaat Samour. 2 Kings, 17, 6.—Mich. 1, 6.—Jos. Ant. 8, 7. 13, 15. 15, 11. Bell Jud. 1, 6.

SAMAROBRIVA, a town of Gaul, now Amiens the chief city of the Ambiani. Its name indicates that it was a place of passage over the river Samara, the word briva signifying in Celtic a bridge. Amm. Marcell. 15, 27. Cæs. B. G. 5, 24, 45, 51.

SAMB, or SAMOS a town on the eastern side of the island of Cephallenia, the inhabitants of which were closely besieged, and afterwards reduced to slavery by the Romans. It retains the name of Samo. Strab. 10.—Liv. 38, 28 et 29.

SAMNITES, a people of Italy, whose territory touched to the north on the Frentani and Peligni, to the west and south on Campania, and to the east on Apulia. It comprehended the southern part of Abruzzo Citra, the greater part of Sannio, the eastern part of Terra di Lavora, and nearly the whole of Principato Ultra. The Sabines being engaged in a long and obstinate war with the Umbri, promised, in the event of victory, to consecrate to the gods whatsoever should be produced in their country during the spring of that year. They conquered, and kept their vows; they dedicated the children born to them in that year to Mars, who, when they had attained a certain age, were sent forth from their country to seek another land. Under the guidance of a bull they arrived in the mountainous country of the Opici, whom they drove out, and then settled there under the name of Sabelli and Samnites. They were a hardy, brave, and ambitious race, remarkable for their inveterate hatred to the Romans, who were unable to subdue them after a war of seventy years, till the success of Sylla put an end to them as a nation. Strab. 5.—Liv. 9, 12. 10, 32. 23, 42.—Vell. Paterc. 2, 15.

SAMNIUM, a region of Italy inhabited by the Samnites. [Vid. Samnites.]——A city of Samnium, near the source of the Vulturnus. Its site is now called Cerro. Flor. 1, 16.

SAMONIUM, or Salmone, a promontory of Crete, forming the extreme point of the island towards the east. It is now cape Salamone. Dionys. Perieg. 109.—Acts, 27, 7.

SAMOS, an island of the Ægean, lying off the lower part of the coast of Ionia, and nearly opposite the promontory of Mycale. The intervening channel was not more than seven stadia in the narrowest part. It is said to have borne in ancient times the names of Parthenia, Dryusa, Anthemis, Melamphylos, &c.; that of Samos was derived either from a hero so called, or from the isle of Cephallenia, which formerly was known by that appellation, and may have sent a colony to its Ionian namesake. Samos was the most important and powerful island of the Ionians. From the reign of Polycrates, 566 B. C., it is celebrated in history for the worship of Juno, who was fabled to have been born here; and it was also distinguished for its skilful seamen and enterprising merchants, who even sailed as far as the mouth of the Guadalquiver through the Pillars of Hercules. The fleets of the rich Samians often made the Persians tremble. At Samos were first cast statues in bronze. It lost the shadow of republican freedom under the reign of Vespasian, A. C. 70. The island of Samos is 175 square miles in extent, and very fruitful. It was the birth-place of Pythagoras. The capital was also called Samos, and its ruins are to be seen at the present day near the modern town of Megalochora. This city was famed for its Heræum, or temple of Juno, which Herodotus considers, together with the temple of Ephesus as the most admirable of all the works of the Grecians. Only one column of this splendid structure is standing; its length was 346 feet, its breadth 189. Strab. 14.—Pous. 7, 4.—Herod. 2, 148. 3, 60.

SAMOSATA, now Samsat, a city of Syria, the capital of the district of Commagene, and the residence of a petty dynasty. It was not only a strong city itself, but had also a strong citadel, and in its neighbourhood was one of the ordinary passages of the Euphrates, on the western bank of which river Samosata was situated. It was the birth-place of Lucian. Amm. Marcell. 18, 4.

SAMOTHRACE, now Samothraki, an island in the Ægean, off the coast of Thrace. It lay opposite the mouth of the Hebrus, and was twenty-eight miles from the coast of Thrace, and sixty-two from Thasos. It once bore the names Leucania, Melite, Electria, Dardania, &c.; but is stated to have been named Samos by a colony from the Ionian island of that name, and to have received the epithet Thracia by way of distinction. Homer sometimes calls it simply Samos, as other times the Thracian Samos. It is about twenty-five miles in circuit, and was said to be one of those islands which were inundated by the sudden overflow of the waters of the Euxine, when forcing their way into the Mediterranean. The original inhabitants were probably Thracians, and appear to have been afterwards joined by Pelasgi, Samians, and Phœnicians. Samothrace derived its chief celebrity from the mysteries of Cybele and her Corybantes, as well as from the Cabiric worship which was intimately connected with them; all mysteries were supposed to have originated in this island, whence it received the surname of Sacred, and became an inviolable asylum for criminals. In it was the mountain Saoce, whence Homer represents Neptune as contemplating the fight before Troy. Pau. 4, 12.—Strab. 10.

—Homer. Il. 13, 12. 24, 78.—Dionys. Perieg. 524.—Herod. 2, 51.—Plor. 2, 12.

SANA, a town of Macedonia, on the Sinus Singiticus, and situated on a neck of land connecting Athos with the continent. On the opposite side was Acanthus, and between the two places was cut the canal of Xerxes. Vid. Acanthus.

SANCHONIĀTHON, a Phœnician historian, who is said to have lived at the time of the Trojan war, B. C. 1271. Philo Byblius translated his Antiquities of the Phœnicians into Greek, and Eusebius preserved a fragment of this work, which has been considered by many writers as a strong confirmation of the Mosaic history. There is an English translation of it by bishop Cumberland.

SANCUS, SANGUS, or SANCTUS, a deity of the Sabines introduced among the gods of Rome under the name of Dius Fidius. According to some, Sancus was father to Sabus, or Sabinus, the first king of the Sabines. Ital. 8, 421.—Varro de L. L. 4, 10.—Ovid. Fast 6, 213.

SANDALIŌTIS, a name given to Sardinia, from its resemblance to a sandal, (σανδάλιον) Plin. 3. 7.

SANDROCOTTUS, an Indian of a mean origin. His impertinence to Alexander was the beginning of his greatness: the conqueror ordered him to be seized, but Sandrocottus fled away, and at last threw himself down overwhelmed with fatigue. While slept on the ground, a lion came to him, and gently licked the sweat from his face. This uncommon tameness of the animal appeared supernatural to Sandrocottus, and raised his ambition. He aspired to the monarchy, and after the death of Alexander he made himself master of a part of the country which was in the hands of Seleucus. Justin. 15, 4.

SANGARIUS, or SANGARIS, one of the largest and most celebrated of the rivers of Asia Minor Strabo says, "it takes its course in Upper Phrygia, near a place called Sangia, about 150 stadia from Pessinus. It then traverses a great part of Galatia and Phrygia and Bithynia, receiving in its course the waters of the Thymbres and Gallus, and other streams, and becoming navigable near its mouth, falls into the Euxine." The modern name is the Sakaria. Hom. Il. 3, 187.—Ovid. ex Pont. 4, 10, 47.—Strab. 12.—Liv. 38, 18.

SANNYRION, an Athenian comic poet, contemporary with Aristophanes. Little is known of him. One of his plays, entitled Danae, in which he burlesqued a verse of the Orestes of Euripides, appears to have been acted about 407 B. C.

SANTŌNES, a people of Gallia Aquitanica, north of the mouth of the Garumna, on the coast. Their capital was Mediolanum Santonum, now Saintes. Plin. 4, 19.—Cæs. B. G. 1, 10. 3. 11.

SAPIS, a river of Cisalpine Gaul, rising in Umbria, and falling into the Adriatic below Ravenna. It is now the Savio. Plin. 3. 15.—Lucan 2. 406.

SAPOR, a king of Persia, who succeeded his father Artaxerxes about the 238th year of the Christian era. Naturally fierce and ambitious Sapor wished to increase his paternal dominions by conquests, and as the indolence of the emperors of Rome seemed favourable to his views, he laid waste the provinces of Mesopotamia, Syria, Cilicia; and he might have become master of all Asia, if Odenatus had not stopped his progress. If Gordian attempted to repel him, his efforts were weak and unavailing, and Philip, who succeeded him on the imperial throne, bought the peace of Sapor with money. Valerian, who was afterwards invested with the purple, marched against the Persian monarch, but he was defeated and taken prisoner Odenatus no sooner heard that the Roman emperor was a captive in the hands of Sapor, than he attempted to release him by force of arms. The forces of Persia were cut to pieces, the wives and the treasures of the monarch fell into the hands of the conqueror, and Odenatus penetrated, with little opposition, into the very heart of the kingdom. Sapor, soon after this defeat, was assassinated by his subjects, A. D. 273, after a reign of 32 years. He was succeeded by his son called Hormisdas —The 2d of that name succeeded his father Hormisdas on the throne of Persia. He was as great as his ancestor of the same name; and by undertaking a war against the Romans, he attempted to enlarge his dominions, and to add the provinces on the west of the Euphrates to his empire. His victories alarmed the Roman emperors, and Julian would have perhaps seized him in the capital of his dominions, if he had not received a mortal wound. Jovian, who succeeded Julian, made peace with Sapor; but the Persian, always restless and indefatigable, renewed hostilities, invaded Armenia and defeated the emperor Valens. Sapor died A. D. 380, after a reign of 70 years, in which he had often been the sport of fortune. He was succeeded by Artaxerxes, and Artaxerxes by Sapor the third, a prince who died after a reign of five years, A. D. 388, in the age of Theodosius the Great.

SAPPHO a celebrated Greek poetess, was a native of Mitylene, in the isle of Lesbos, and flourished about B. C 610. She married a rich inhabitant of Andros, by whom she had a daughter, and it was not, probably, till after she became a widow, that she rendered herself so distinguished by her poetry and amours. Her verses were chiefly of the lyric kind, and love was their general subject, which she treated with so much warmth and nature, and with such beauty of poetical expressions, as to have acquired the title of the "Tenth Muse." From various authors, Greek and Roman, we learn the esteem in which her compositions were held among those of the same class; and no female name has risen higher in the catalogue of poets. Her morals, however, have been as much depreciated, as her genius has been extolled. Besides her desperate passion for Phaon, she has been accused of an unnatural attachment to several of her own sex. There are various accounts of her death, but that most generally received states, that unable to bear the neglect of Phaon, she repaired to the famous precipice of Leucate, popularly called the Lover's Leap, and threw herself into the sea, which terminated at once both her life and her love. The Mitylenians are said to have honoured her memory by stamping her image upon their coin. Of the poems of Sappho, two pieces only are left, an Ode to a Young Female, and a Hymn to Venus, with some fragments quoted by the scholiast and others. The most esteemed text of these is that given by Dr Bloomfield, in the Museum Criticum, vol. I Of the Ode an elegant translation is given by Catullus. That and the Hymn are known to the English reader by the versions of Ambrose Philips. Ovid. Heroid. 15 et 21. Trist. 2, 365. — Horat. Od 2. 14. Herod. 2, 135. — *Stat. SARACENI, or Arraceni, a name first belonging to a people in Arabia Felix, and derived most probably from that of the town Arra The application of the name Saracen to all the Arabians, and thence to all Mahometans, is of comparatively recent origin.

SARAVUS, now the Sure, a river of Belgium, falling into the Moselle.

SARDANAPALUS, the 40th and last king of Assyria, celebrated for his luxury and voluptuousness. The greatest part of his time was spent in the company of his eunuchs, and the monarch generally appeared in the midst of his concubines disguised in the habit of a female, and spinning wool for his amusement This effeminacy irritated his officers, Belesis and Arsaces conspired against him, and collected a numerous force to dethrone him. Sardanapalus quitted his voluptuousness for a while, and appeared at the head of his armies. The rebels were defeated in three successive battles, but at last Sardanapalus was beaten and besieged in the city of Ninus for two years. When he despaired of success, he burned himself in his palace, with his eunuchs, concubines, and all his treasures, and the empire of Assyria was divided among the conspirators. This famous event happened B C 820, according to Eusebius; though Justin and others, with less probability, place it 80 years earlier Sardanapalus was made a god after death. SARDES. Vid. Sardis.

SARDICA, or SERDICA, a city belonging originally to Thrace, but subsequently included within the limits of Dacia Ripensis and made the capital of this province. It was situate in a fertile plain, through which flowed the river Pescus. The emperor Maximian was born in its vicinity, and it is known in the annals of the church from a council having been held within its walls. Eutrop. 9, 22.

SARDINIA, an island in the Mediterranean south of Corsica and west of Italy. It was called Sardo by the Greeks, and Ichnusa or Sandaliotis, from its resemblance to the print of a foot or sandal The name of the island is said to have been obtained from Sardus, a son of Hercules, who settled there with a colony from Libya, and dispossessed some Ilians, who had gone thither after the destruction of Troy. The Iberians followed the Libyans, and after these, came other colonies of Thespians and Athenians, under Iolas; the Tyrrhenians had settlements there for a time, and the Carthaginians were long masters of it, till it fell into the hands of the Romans, with Corsica. It was called by some, one of the granaries of Rome; its climate was fertile, though unwholesome: no serpents or wolves were there to be met with, and only one poisonous herb, which, if eaten, contracted the nerves, and produced a grin of laughter ("Sardonious risus"), under which the patient died. Herod 1, 170. 5, 106. — *Aristoph. SARDIS, or Sardes, now Sart, a city of Lydia, the ancient capital of the monarchs of the country. It was situate at the foot of the northern slope of mount Tmolus It is famous for the many sieges which it sustained against the Cimmerians, Persians, Medes, Macedonians, Ionians, and Athenians. It fell into the hands of Cyrus, B C 548, on which occasion Crœsus was made his prisoner. It was burnt by the Athenians B C. 504, which afforded Darius his pretext for invading Attica, and burning all the Greek temples that fell into his power. Antiochus Soter was here defeated by Eumenes, king of Pergamus, B. C 262. Sardes was one of the seven churches mentioned in the Revelation of St John. It was destroyed by an earthquake, with eleven other cities, in the reign of Tiberius. Herod. 1, 7, &c. Xen. Anab. 1, 2, 5. — Horat. Ep. 1, 11, 2. — *Tacit. SARDUS, a son of Hercules, who led a colony to Sardinia and gave it his name.

SAREPTA, or Zarephath, a city on the shore of the Mediterranean, between Tyre and Sidon. It was the place where the widow dwelt to whom the prophet Elijah was sent, and was preserved by her cruse of oil and barrel of meal that failed not. It is now a small village called Zarfa 1 Kings 17, 9.

SARMATIA, an extensive country, extending from the river Vistula to the Caspian sea, and from mount Caucasus and the shores of the Euxine to the northernmost limits of the known world. It was divided by the river Tanais into Europæa and Asiatica. Sarmatia Europæa was bounded on the east by the Tanais, on the south by the Palus Mæotis, the Pontus Euxinus, and the river Tyras, on the west by a part of the Danube, by the Vistula, and the Sinus Codanus; and on the north by the Hyperboreus Oceanus or Arctic Ocean. It corresponded generally with modern Russia in Europe. Sarmatia Asiatica was bounded upon the west by the Tanais, upon the south by the Euxine sea and by mount Caucasus, and upon the east by the Caspian sea, the river Rha, and the Rhymnici Montes All the inhabitants of this vast extent of country were formerly known to the ancients by the collective name of Scythians, as being a portion of that powerful nation inhabiting the whole northern part of Asia as well as of Europe, from the shores of the Ister to the utmost northern and eastern limits of the known world. The appellation Sauromatæ or Sarmatæ was originally described as being that of a separate Scythian tribe on the shores of the Palus Mæotis, between the Borysthenes and Tanais; the Sarmatæ and Scythians are by others, however, called Iazyges, an indigenous name signifying merely people, that of Scythians having never been used by the natives themselves. The Sauromatæ or Sarmatæ, from being one of the most powerful tribes of the whole nation, contrived to make their name the collective one for the whole Scythian horde on the borders of the Euxine sea and Dacia. And when the Romans found people speaking the same language, and using the same customs as these southern Sarmatæ, on the shores of the Danube, the Vistula, and the Baltic Sea, they readily adopted a general appellation, which they had long wanted to distinguish all the people as far eastward as the Caspian sea, and henceforward called them Sarmatæ and their country Sarmatia. The Sarmatæ are described by the ancients as a most savage and uncultivated people, exceedingly immoral, and addicted to war and rapine; they were accustomed to paint their bodies in order to appear more terrible to their enemies. They lived a nomadic life, plundering all who fell in their way; and many of them are said to have fed upon the blood of horses mixed with milk, whence they were surnamed Hippomolgi. They generally lived under tents or in waggons, and were from the latter custom, particularly one tribe on the banks of the Borysthenes, called Hamaxobii Strab 7, &c — Mel. 2, 4. Dion. 2. Flor. 4 12. — Lucan. 2 &c. — Juv. Sat. 2, 1. 3, 69. 15, 125. — Ovid. Trist 3, &c.

SARMATICUM MARE, a name given to the Euxine sea, because on the coast of Sarmatia. Ovid ex Pont. 4 10 28.

SARNUS, a river of Campania, now the Sarno, falling into the sea about a mile from Pompeii. Strab. 5. — Virg. Æn. 7, 738

SARON, a king of Trœzene, unusually fond of hunting. He was drowned in the sea, where he had swum for some time in pursuit of a stag. He was made a sea-god by Neptune, and divine honours were paid to him by the Trœzenians. It was customary for sailors to offer him sacrifices before they embarked, That part of the sea where he was drowned was called Saronicus sinus, on the coast of Achaia, near the isthmus of Corinth. Saron built a temple to Diana at Trœzene, and instituted festivals to her honour, called from himself Saronia. Paus. 2, 30.— Mela, 2 3.

SARONICUS SINUS, now the Gulf of Ægina, a bay of the Ægean sea, lying at the south-west of Attica, and north east of Argolis, and commencing between the promontories of Sunium and Scyllæum. Some suppose that this part of the sea received its name from Saron, who was drowned there; or from a small river which discharged itself on the coast, or from a small harbour of the same name. The true root is Saron, which in ancient Greek signified an oak-leaf. The Saronic bay is about sixty-two miles in circumference, twenty-three miles in its broadest, and twenty-five in its longest part, according to modern calculation

SARPEDON, a son of Jupiter by Europa, the daughter of Agenor. He banished himself from Crete, after he had in vain attempted to make himself king in preference to his elder brother Minos, and he retired to Caria, where he built the town of Miletus. He went to the Trojan war to assist Priam against the Greeks, where he was attended by his friend and companion Glaucus. He was at last killed by Patroclus, after he had made a great slaughter of the enemy, and his body, by order of Jupiter, was conveyed to Lycia by Apollo, where his friends and relations paid him funeral honours, and raised a monument to perpetuate his valour. According to some mythologists the brother of king Minos, and the prince who assisted Priam, were two different persons. This last was king of Lycia, and son of Jupiter, by Laodamia, the daughter of Bellerophon, and lived about a hundred years after the age of the son of Europa. Apollod. 3, 1. —Herod. 1, 173. — Homer Il. 16.——A preceptor of Cato of Utica, famous for his learning and the excellent qualities of his mind. Plut. in Cat.——A promontory in Cilicia, beyond which Antiochus was not permitted to sail by a treaty of peace which he had made with the Romans. Liv. 38, 38 — Mela, 1, 13.——A promontory of Thrace, between the river Erginus and the Sinus Melas. Herod 7, 58.

SARRA, a town of Phœnicia, the same as Tyre. It receives its name from a small shell-fish of the same name, which was found in the neighbourhood, and with whose blood garments were dyed, Hence came the epithet of Sarranus; so often applied to Tyrian colours, as well as to the inhabitants of the colonies of the Tyrians, particularly Carthage. Sil. 6, 662. 13, 205. — Virg. G 2, 506.

SARRASTES, a people of Campania on the Sarnus, who assisted Turnus against Æneas. Virg. Æn. 7, 738.

SARSINA, a city of Umbria in the northern part of the country and on the left bank of the Sapis, towards its source. It was the birth-place of Plautus the comic poet. It still retains its name. Plin. 3, 14.— Sil Ital. 8, 402 — Martial. 9, 59.

SATICULA, a town of Samnium, the site of which has not been precisely determined. It is supposed to correspond to the modern Agata dei Goti Liv. 9 21. 23, 39

SATUREIUM, a town in the Tarentine territory, frequently alluded to by the ancient writers It was famed for the fertility of the surrounding country, and for its breed of horses. Virg. G. 2, 197 — Horat Sat 1, 6, 59.

SATURNALIA, festivals in honour of Saturn, celebrated the sixteenth or the seventeenth, or, according to others, the eighteenth of December. They were instituted long before the foundation of Rome, in commemoration of the freedom and equality which prevailed on earth in the golden reign of Saturn. Some however suppose, that the Saturnalia were first observed at Rome in the reign of Tullus Hostilius, after a victory obtained over the Sabines, while others support, that Janus first instituted them in gratitude to Saturn, from whom he had learnt agriculture. Others suppose, that they were first celebrated in the year of Rome 257, after a victory obtained over the Latins by the dictator Posthumius. The Saturnalia were originally celebrated only for one day, but afterwards the solemnity continued for three, and at last, by order of Caligula, for five days The celebration was remarkable for the liberty which universally prevailed. The slaves were permitted to ridicule their masters, and to speak with freedom upon every subject. It was usual for friends to make presents one to another; all animosity ceased, no criminals were executed, schools were shut, war was never declared, but all was mirth, riot, and debauchery. In the sacrifices the priests made their offerings with their heads uncovered, a custom which was never observed at other festivals. Senec ep. 18 Cato de R R. 57.—Sueton. in Vesp. 19. — Cic. ad Attic 5, 20.

SATURNIA, a name given to Italy, because Saturn had reigned there during the golden age. Virg. G. 2, 173.——A name given to Juno, as being the daughter of Saturn Virg G 2, 173. Æn. 3, 80.——An ancient city of Etruria, whose ruins may be seen near the source of the Albinia, and which is mentioned by Dionysius of Halicarnassus, as formerly occupied by the Pelasgi. It received a colony from Rome, A. U. C. 569. Dion. Hal. 1, 21.—Liv. 39 55.

SATURNINUS, P. Sempronius, a general of Valerian, proclaimed emperor in Egypt by his troops after he had rendered himself celebrated by his victories over the barbarians. His integrity, his complaisance and affability, had gained him the affection of the people, but his fondness for ancient discipline provoked his soldiers, who wantonly murdered him in the 43d year of his age. A. D. 282. —— Sextus Julius, a Gaul, intimate with Aurelian. The emperor esteemed him greatly, not only for his private virtues, but for his abilities as a general, and for the victories which he had obtained in different parts of the empire. He was saluted emperor at Alexandria, and compelled by the clamorous army to accept of the purple, which he rejected with disdain and horror. Probus, who was then emperor, marched his forces against him, and besieged him in Apamea, where he destroyed himself when unable to make head against his powerful adversary. —— Lucius Appuleius, a tribune of the people, who raised a sedition at Rome, intimidated the senate, and tyrannized for three years. Meeting at last with opposition, he seized the capitol, but being induced by the hopes of a reconciliation to trust himself amidst the people, he was suddenly torn to pieces. His sedition has received the name of Appuleana in the Roman annals. Flor. 3, 16 ——Lucius, a seditious tribune, who supported the oppression of Marius. He was at last put to death on account of his tumultuous disposition. Plut. in Mario. ——Pompeius, a writer in the reign of Trajan. He was greatly esteemed by Pliny, who speaks of him with great warmth and approbation, as an historian, a poet, and an orator. Pliny always consulted the opinion of Saturninus before he published his compositions.

SATURNIUS a name given to Jupiter, Pluto, and Neptune, as being the sons of Saturn.

SATURNUS, a son of Cœlus, or Uranus, by Terra, called also Titea, Thea, or Tellusa. He was naturally artful, and by means of his mother, he revenged himself on his father, whose cruelty to his children had provoked the anger of Thea. The mother armed her son with a scythe, which was fabricated with the metals drawn from her bowels, and as Cœlus was going to unite himself to Thea Saturn mutilated him, and for ever prevented him from increasing the number of his children, whom he treated with unkindness and confined in the infernal regions. After this the sons of Cœlus were restored to liberty, and Saturn obtained his father's kingdom by the consent of his brother, provided he did not bring up any male children. Pursuant to this agreement, Saturn always devoured his sons as soon as born, because, as some observe, he dreaded from them a retaliation of his unkindness to his father, till his wife Rhea, unwilling to see her children perish, concealed from her husband the birth of Jupiter, Neptune, and Pluto, and instead of the children she gave him large stones, which he immediately swallowed without perceiving the deceit. Titan was some time after informed that Saturn had concealed his male children, therefore he made war against him, dethroned and imprisoned him with Rhea; and Jupiter, who was secretly educated in Crete, was no sooner grown up, than he flew to deliver his father, and to replace him on the throne. Saturn, unmindful of his son's kindness, conspired against him, when he heard that he raised cabals against him, but Jupiter banished him from his throne, and the father fled for safety into Italy, where the country retained the name of Latium, as being the place of his concealment (latet). Janus, who was then king of Italy, received Saturn with marks of attention, he made him his partner on the throne; and the king of heaven employed himself in civilizing the barbarous manners of the people of Italy, and in teaching them agriculture and the useful and liberal arts. His reign there was so mild and popular, so beneficent and virtuous, that mankind have called it the golden age, to intimate the happiness and tranquillity which the earth then enjoyed. Saturn was father of Chiron the centaur by Philyra, whom he had changed into a mare, to avoid the importunities of Rhea. The worship of Saturn was not so solemn or so universal as that of Jupiter. It was usual to offer human victims on his altars, but this barbarous custom was abolished by Hercules, who substituted small images of clay. In the sacrifices of Saturn, the priest always performed the ceremony with his head uncovered, which was unusual at other solemnities. The god is generally represented as an old man bent through age and infirmity. He holds a scythe in his right hand, with a serpent which bites its own tail, which is an emblem of time and of the revolution of the year. In his left hand he holds a child, which he raises up as if instantly to devour it. Tatius, king of the Sabines, first built a temple to Saturn on the Capitoline hill, a second was afterwards added by Tullus Hostilius, and a third by the first consuls. On his statues were generally hung fetters, in commemoration of the chains he had worn when imprisoned by Jupiter. From this circumstance all slaves that obtained their liberty, generally dedicated their fetters to him. During the celebration of the Saturnalia, the chains were taken from the statues to intimate the freedom and the independence which mankind enjoyed during the golden age. One of his temples at Rome was appropriated for the public treasury, and it was there also that the names of foreign ambassadors were enrolled. Hesiod. Theog. — Apollod. 1, 1. — Virg. Æn. 8, 319.— Paus. 8, 8.—Tibull. El 3. 35.—Hom. Il.—Ovid. Fast. 4, 197. Met 1, 123.

SATYRI, demigods of the country, whose origin is unknown. They are represented like men, but with the feet and the legs of goats, short horns on the head, and the whole body covered with thick hair. They chiefly attended upon Bacchus, and rendered themselves known in his orgies by their riot and lasciviousness. The first fruits of everything were generally offered to them. The Romans promiscuously called them, Fauns, Panes, and Sylvani. It is said that a Satyr was brought to Sylla, as the general returned from Thessaly. The monster had been surprised asleep in a cave; but his voice was inarticulate when brought into the presence of the Roman general, and Sylla was so disgusted with it, that he ordered it to be instantly removed. This monster answered in every degree the description which the poets and painters have given of the Satyrs. Paus. 1, 23. —Plut. in Syll.—Virg E. 5, 13.—Ov. Her. 4, 171

SATYRUS, a king of Bosphorus, who reigned fourteen years, &c. His father's name was Spartacus. Diod. 20. —— An Athenian who attempted to eject the garrison of Demetrius from the citadel, &c. Polyæn. ——A Greek actor who instructed Demosthenes, and taught him how to have a good and strong delivery. ——A man who assisted in murdering Timophanes, by order of his brother Timoleon ——A Rhodian sent by his countrymen to Rome, when Eumenes had accused some of the allies of intentions to favour the interest of Macedonia against the republic.——A peripatetic philosopher and historian, who flourished B. C. 148. ——A tyrant of Heraclea, 346 B. C.

SAUFEIUS, TROGUS, one of Messalina's favourites, punished by Claudius, &c. Tac. Ann. 11, 35.——Appius, a Roman, who died on his return from the bath upon taking mead, &c. Plin. 7, 53

SAUROMATÆ a people called Sarmatæ by the Latins. Vid. Sarmatia.

SAURUS, a famous robber of Elis, killed by Hercules. Paus. 6, 21.——A statuary. Plin. 36, 5

SAUS or SAVUS, a river of Pannonia, rising in the Alpes Carnicæ, and flowing into the Danube at Singidunum. It forms near its mouth the south-eastern boundary of Pannonia, and is now the Sau or Save. Pan. 3, 18.

SAXONES, a people of Germany, whose original seats appear to have been on the neck of the Chersonesus Cimbrica, from the mouth of the Elbe to the Sinus Codanus and the river Chalusus (or Trave), corresponding to modern Holstein. Ptol. 3, 11.

SCÆA, one of the gates of Troy, where the tomb of Laomedon was seen. It received its name from sævia, sinister, as it was on the left side of the city, facing the sea and the Grecian camp. Homer. Il.—Sil. 13, 73.——One of the Danaides. Her husband's name was Dayphron. Apollod SCÆVA, a soldier in Cæsar's army, who behaved with great courage at Dyrrachium. Lucan 6, 144 ——Memor, a Latin poet in the reign of Titus and Domitian.——A friend of Horace to whom the poet addressed ep. 1, 17. He was a Roman knight.

SCÆVOLA. Vid. Mutius.

SCALABIS, a city of Lusitania, north of the Tagus. It answers to the modern Santarem a corruption for St Irene. Plin. 4, 22.

SCALDIS, a river of Gallia Belgica Secunda, rising in the territory of the Atrebates, and falling into the Mosa or Meuse. It is now the Scheldt or Escaut. Cæs B C 6, 37.

SCAMANDER, or SCAMANDROS, a celebrated river of Troas, rising in the highest part of mount Ida, in the same hill with the Granicus and Æsopus, and falling into the sea at Sigæum. It received in a part of its course the river Simois, and between these two streams Troy is supposed to have stood. According to Homer, it was called Xanthus, by the gods, and Scamander among men. The name Xanthus would seem to refer to the yellow hue of its waters. It is generally supposed to be the modern Mendere. ——A son of Corybas and Demodice, who brought a colony from Crete into Phrygia, and settled at the foot of mount Ida, where he introduced the festivals of Cybele, and the dances of the Corybantes. He some time after lost the use of his senses, and threw himself into the river Xanthus, which ever after bore his name. His son-in-law Teucer succeeded him in the government of the colony. He had two daughters, Thymo, and Callithoe. Apollod. 3, 12.

SCAMANDRIA, a town on the Scamander. Plin. 4, 30.

SCAMANDRIUS, one of the generals of Priam, son of Strophius. He was killed by Menelaus. Homer. Il. 5, 49

SCANDINAVIA, a name given by the ancients to that tract of territory which contains the modern Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Lapland, Finland, &c. Plin. 4, 13.

SCANTINIA LEX. Vid. Scatinia.

SCAPTESYLE, or Scapte-Kyle, a place on the coast of Thrace, over against the island of Thasos, famous for its gold mines, where Thucydides retired on his banishment from Athens, and wrote the history of the Peloponnesian war. Thucyd. 4, 104.

SCARDUS, or Scordus, a ridge of lofty mountains, forming the natural boundary of Illyria on the side of Macedonia. The Turks and Servians call it Tchar Dagh Liv. 43, 20. 44. 31.

SCATINIA LEX, de pudicitia, by C. Scatinius Aricinus, the tribune, was enacted against those who were guilty of unnatural offences. The punishment at first was a fine; but it was afterwards made capital. It is sometimes called Scantinia Lex; not, however, from one Scantinius, who, according to Valerius Maximus, was the first person condemned under it; but probably from the name of the individual who proposed the law, Scantinius and not Scatinius.

SCAURUS, M Æmilius, a Roman consul, who distinguished himself by his eloquence at the bar, and by his successes in Spain. He was sent against Jugurtha, but his exertions as commander and as ambassador, were checked by the bribes of the Numidian prince, and the Romans seemed more anxious to obtain the gold of Jugurtha, than avenge the wrongs of Massinissa's murdered family. Every accusation against Scaurus for corruption or dereliction of duty was silenced by his superior influence, and he was invested with new offices. In an ensuing campaign he conquered the Ligurians, and in his censorship he built the Milvian bridge at Rome, and began to pave the road, which from him was called the Æmilian. He was originally very poor. He wrote some books, and among these a history of his own life, all now lost. His son, of the same name, made himself known by the large theatre which he built during his edileship. This theatre, which could contain 30,000 spectators, was supported by 360 columns of marble, 38 feet in height, and adorned with 3000 brazen statues. This celebrated edifice proved more fatal to the manners and the simplicity of the Romans, than the proscriptions and wars of Sylla had done to the inhabitants of the city. Scaurus married Mucia. Cic. in Brut.—Val. Max. 4, 4.—Plin. 34, 7. 36, 2.——A Roman of consular dignity. When the Cimbri invaded Italy, the son of Scaurus behaved with great cowardice, upon which the father sternly ordered him never to appear again in the field of battle. The severity of this command rendered young Scaurus melancholy, and he plunged a sword into his own heart, to free himself from farther ignominy.——Aurelius, a Roman consul, taken prisoner by the Gauls. He was put to cruel death because he told the king of the enemy not to cross the Alps to invade Italy, which was universally deemed unconquerable.

SCELERATUS, Collis, a plain at Rome near the Colline gate, where the vestal Minucia was buried alive, when convicted of adultery. Liv. 8. 15 ——One of the gates of Rome was called Scelerata, because 300 Fabii, who were killed at the river Cremera, had passed through it when they went to attack the enemy. It was before named Carmentalis.——There was also a street at Rome formerly called Cyprius, which received the name of the Sceleratus vicus, because there Tullia ordered her postilion to drive her chariot over the dead body of her father, king Servius. Liv. 1 48.— Ovid. Ib 365.

SCENA, or Scenus, a river of Hibernia, now the Shannon. Ora. 1, 2.

SCENÆ, a city of Mesopotamia, on the borders of Babylonia. Strab. 16

SCENITÆ, a nomadic tribe in Arabia Felix. Plin. 5, 11.

SCEPSIS, a city of Troas, situate beyond the river Cebren, near the highest part of Ida. It was hither that the libraries of Aristotle and Theophrastus were brought by Neleus, to whom they had been left by the latter, and whose heirs, fearing they might be forcibly seized by the king of Pergamus in his zeal for collecting, buried them under ground After the lapse of 160 years, during which they suffered materially from the wet, they were dug up and sold to Apellicon the Teian, who conveyed them to Athens and disfigured them with frequent interpolations; at his death his library was removed to Rome by Sylla Strab. 13.

SCHEDIA, a considerable village of Egypt, on the western side of the Canobic branch of the Nile, and the place where duties were levied on exports and imports. Strab. 17.

SCHERIA, an ancient name of Corcyra. Paus. 2, 5.— Plin. 4, 12

SCIÁTHOS, now Skiatho, an island off the coast of Thessaly, about four miles to the east of the Magnesian promontory. It was originally inhabited by the Pelasgi, and subsequently by the Eubœans. It produced good wine, and once possessed a town of some size, which was destroyed by Philip the son of Demetrius, to prevent its falling into the hands of Attalus and the Romans. Plin. 4, 12.—Liv. 31, 28. 44, 13.

SCILLUS, a town of Elis, below the Alpheus, and not far from the coast. It was given to Xenophon by the Lacedæmonians, when he was banished by his fellow-citizens for having served in the army of the younger Cyrus. He built a temple here to Diana Ephesia, in performance of a vow made during the retreat of the ten thousand, after the fatal battle of Cunaxa. When the Eleans gained possession of the place, they tried him for having accepted it from the Spartans, but being acquitted, he was allowed to reside here. His tomb was shown here, and over it, his statue of Pentelic marble. Paus. 5, 6. Xen Anab 5, 3, 7.

SCINIS, a cruel robber who tied men to the boughs of trees, which he had forcibly brought together, and which he afterwards unloosed, so that their limbs were torn in an instant from their body. Ovid. Met. 7, 440.

SCIPIÁDÆ, a name applied to the two Scipios, who obtained the surname of Africanus, from the conquests of Carthage. Virg. Æn. 6, 843.

SCIPIO, a celebrated family at Rome who obtained the greatest honours in the republic. The name seems to be derived from scipio, which signifies a stick, because one of the family had conducted his blind father, and had been to him as a stick. The Scipios were a branch of the Cornelian family. The most illustrious were—P. Corn. a man made master of horse by Camillus, &c ——A Roman dictator. ——L Cornel. a consul A. U. C. 456, who defeated the Etrurians near Volaterra.——Cn. surnamed Asina was consul A. U. C. 494 & 500. He was conquered in his first consulship in a naval battle, and lost 17 ships. The following year he took Aleria, in Corsica, and defeated Hanno, the Carthaginian general, in Sardinia. He also took 200 of the enemy's ships, and the city of Panormum in Sicily. He was father to Publius and Cneus Scipio Publius, in the beginning of the second Punic war, was sent with an army to Spain to oppose Annibal; but when he heard that his enemy had passed over into Italy, he attempted by his quick marches and secret evolutions to stop his progress He was conquered by Annibal near the Ticinus, where he nearly lost his life, had not his son, who was afterwards surnamed Africanus, courageously defended him. He again passed into Spain, where he obtained some memorable victories over the Carthaginians, and the inhabitants of the country. His brother Cneus shared the supreme command with him, but their great confidence proved their ruin. They separated their armies, and soon after Publius was furiously attacked by the two Asdrubals and Mago, who commanded the Carthaginian armies. The forces of Publius were too few to resist with success the three Carthaginian generals. The Romans were cut to pieces, and their commander was left on the field of battle. No sooner had the enemy obtained this victory than they immediately marched to meet Cneus Scipio, whom the revolt of 30,000 Celtiberians had weakened and alarmed. The general, who was already apprized of his brother's death, secured an eminence, where he was soon surrounded on all sides After desperate acts of valour he was left among the slain, or according to some, he fled into a tower where he was burnt with some of his friends by the victorious enemy. Liv. 21, &c.—Flor. 2, 6, &c.—Eutrop 3, 5, &c. Publius Cornelius surnamed Africanus, was son of Publius Scipio, who was killed in Spain. He first distinguished himself at the battle of Ticinus, where he saved his father's life by deeds of unexampled valour and boldness. The battle of Cannæ, which proved so fatal to the Roman arms, instead of disheartening Scipio, raised his expectations, and he no sooner heard, that some of his desperate countrymen wished to abandon Italy, and to fly from the insolence of the conqueror, than with his sword in his hand, and by his firmness and example, he obliged them to swear eternal fidelity to Rome, and to put to immediate death the first man who attempted to retire from his country. In his 21st year, Scipio was made an edile, an honourable office, which was never given but to such as had reached their 27th year. Some time after, the Romans were alarmed by the intelligence that the commanders of their forces in Spain, Publius and Cneus Scipio, had been slaughtered, and immediately young Scipio was appointed to avenge the death of his father, and of his uncle, and to vindicate the military honour of the republic. It was soon known how able he was to be at the head of an army; the various nations of Spain were conquered, and in four years the Carthaginians were banished from that part of the continent, the whole province became tributary to Rome; new Carthage submitted in one day, and in a battle 54,000 of the enemy were left dead on the field. After these signal victories, Scipio was recalled to Rome, which still trembled at the continual alarms of Annibal, who was at her gates. The conqueror of the Carthaginians in Spain was looked upon as a proper general to encounter Annibal in Italy; but Scipio opposed the measures which his countrymen wished to pursue, and he declared in the senate that if Annibal was to be conquered he must be conquered in Africa. These bold measures were immediately adopted, though opposed by the eloquence, age, and experience of the great Fabius, and Scipio was empowered to conduct the war on the coasts of Africa. With the dignity of consul he embarked for Carthage. Success attended his arms, his conquests were here as rapid as in Spain; the Carthaginian armies were routed, the camp of the crafty Asdrubal was set on fire during the night, and his troops totally defeated in a drawn battle. These repeated losses alarmed Carthage, Annibal, who was victorious at the gates of Rome, was instantly recalled to defend the walls of his country, and the two greatest generals of the age met each other in the field. Terms of accommodation were proposed; but in the parley which the two commanders had together, nothing satisfactory was offered, and while the one enlarged on the vicissitudes of human affairs, the other wished to dictate like a conqueror, and recommended the decision of the controversy to the sword. The celebrated battle was fought near Zama, and both generals displayed their military knowledge in drawing up their armies and in choosing their ground. Their courage and intrepidity were not less conspicuous in charging the enemy; a thousand acts of valour were performed on both sides, and though the Carthaginians fought in their own defence, and the Romans for fame and glory, yet the conqueror of Italy was vanquished. About 20,000 Carthaginians were slain, and the same number made prisoners of war. B. C. 202. Only 2000 of the Romans were killed. This battle was decisive; the Carthaginians sued for peace, which Scipio at last granted on the most severe and humiliating terms. The conqueror after this returned to Rome, where he was received with the most unbounded applause, honoured with a triumph, and dignified with the appellation of Africanus. Here he enjoyed for some time the tranquillity and the honours which his exploits merited, but in him also as in other great men, fortune showed herself inconstant. Scipio offended the populace in wishing to distinguish the senators from the rest of the people at the public exhibitions; and when he canvassed for the consulship for two of his friends, he had the mortification to see his application slighted, and the honours which he claimed bestowed on a man of no character, and recommended by neither abilities nor meritorious actions. He retired from Rome no longer to be a spectator of the ingratitude of his countrymen, and in the capacity of lieutenant he accompanied his brother against Antiochus, king of Syria. In this expedition his arms were attended with usual success, and the Asiatic monarch submitted to the conditions which the conquerors dictated. At his return to Rome, Africanus found the malevolence of his enemies still unabated. Cato, his inveterate rival, raised seditions against him, and the Petilii, two tribunes of the people, accused the conqueror of Annibal of extortion in the provinces of Asia, and of living in an indolent and luxurious manner. Scipio condescended to answer to the accusation of his calumniators; the first day was spent in hearing the different charges, but when he again appeared on the second day of his trial, the accused interrupted his judges, and exclaimed, "Tribunes and fellow-citizens, on this day, this very day, did I conquer Annibal and the Carthaginians; come, therefore, with me, Romans; let us go to the capitol, and there return our thanks to the immortal gods for the victories which have attended our arms." These words had the desired effect, the tribes, and all the assembly followed Scipio, the court was deserted, and the tribunes were left alone in the seat of judgment. Yet when this memorable day was past and forgotten, Africanus was a third time summoned to appear; but he had fled before the impending storm, and retired to his country-house at Liternum. The accusation was therefore stopped, and the accusers silenced, when one of the tribunes, formerly distinguished for his malevolence against Scipio rose to defend him, and declared in the assembly, that it reflected the highest disgrace on the Roman people, that the conqueror of Annibal should become the sport of the populace, and be exposed to the malice and envy of disappointed ambition. Some time after Scipio died in the place of his retreat, about 184 years before Christ, in the 48th year of his age; and so great an aversion did he express, as he expired, for the depravity of the Romans, and the ingratitude of their senators, that he ordered his bones not to be conveyed to Rome. They were accordingly inhumated at Liternum, where his wife Æmilia, the daughter of Paulus Æmilius, who fell at the battle of Canna, raised a mausoleum on his tomb, and placed upon it his statue, with that of the poet Ennius, who had been the companion of his peace and of his retirement. If Scipio was robbed during his life-time of the honours which belonged to him as the conqueror of Africa, he was not forgotten when dead. The Romans viewed his character with reverence; with raptures they read of his warlike actions, and Africanus was regarded in the following ages as a pattern of virtue, innocence, courage, and liberality. As a general, the fame and greatness of his conquests explain his character; and indeed we hear that Annibal declared himself inferior to no general that ever lived except Alexander the Great, and Pyrrhus king of Epirus; and when Scipio asked him what rank he would claim, if he had conquered him, the Carthaginian general answered, "If I had conquered you, Scipio, I would call myself greater than the conqueror of Darius and the ally of the Tarentines." As an instance of Scipio's continence, ancient authors have faithfully recorded that the conqueror of Spain refused to see a beautiful princess that had fallen into his hands after the taking of New Carthage, and that he not only restored her inviolate to her parents, but also added immense presents for the person to whom she was betrothed. It was to the artful complaisance of Africanus that the Romans owed their alliance with Masinissa, king of Numidia, and also that with king Syphax. The friendship of Scipio and Lælius is well known. Polyb. 6. — Flor. 2, 6. — Cic. in Brut. &c. — Eutrop.—— Lucius Cornelius, surnamed Asiaticus, accompanied his brother Africanus in his expeditions in Spain and Africa. He was rewarded with the consulship, A. U. C. 564, for his services to the state, and he was empowered to attack Antiochus king of Syria, who had declared war against the Romans. Lucius was accompanied in this campaign by his brother Africanus; and by his own valour, and the advice of the conqueror of Annibal, he soon routed the enemy, and in a battle near the city of Sardes he killed 50,000 foot and 4000 horse. Peace was soon after settled by the submission of Antiochus, and the conqueror, at his return home, obtained a triumph, and the surname of Asiaticus He did not, however, long enjoy his prosperity; Cato, after the death of Africanus, turned his fury against Asiaticus, and the two Petilli, his devoted favourites, presented a petition to the people, in which they prayed that an enquiry might be made to know what money had been received from Antiochus and his allies. The petition was instantly received, and Asiaticus, charged to have suffered himself to be corrupted by Antiochus, was summoned to appear before the tribunal of Terentius Culeo, who was on this occasion created prætor. The judge, who was an inveterate enemy to the family of the Scipios, soon found Asiaticus with his two lieutenants and his quæstor, guilty of having received, the first 6,000 pounds weight of gold, and 480 pounds weight of silver, and the others nearly an equal sum, from the monarch against whom, in the name of the Roman people, they were enjoined to make war Immediately they were condemned to pay large fines, but while the others gave security, Scipio declared that he had accounted to the public for all the money which he had brought from Asia, and therefore that he was innocent For this obstinacy Scipio was dragged to prison, but his cousin Nasica pleaded his cause before the people, and the prætor instantly ordered the goods of the prisoner to be seized and confiscated. The sentence was executed, but the effects of Scipio were insufficient to pay the fine, and it was the greatest justification of his innocence, that whatever was found in his house had never been in the possession of Antiochus or his subjects . This, however, did not totally liberate him, he was reduced to poverty, and refused to accept the offer of his friends and of his clients. Some time after he was appointed to settle the disputes between Eumenes and Seleucus, and at his return the Romans ashamed of their severity towards him, rewarded his merit with such uncommon liberality, that Asiaticus was enabled to celebrate games in honour of his victory over Antiochus, for ten successive days, at his own expense. Liv. 38, 55, &c — Eutrop. 4.—— Nasica was son of Cneus Scipio, and cousin to Scipio Africanus. He was refused the consulship, though supported by the interest and the fame of the conqueror of Annibal; but he afterwards obtained it, and in that honourable office conquered the Boii, and gained a triumph. He was also successful in an expedition which he undertook in Spain. When the statue of Cybele was brought to Rome from Phrygia, the Roman senate delegated one of their body, who was the most remarkable for the purity of his manners and the innocence of his life, to go and meet the goddess in the harbour of Ostia. Nasica was the object of their choice, and as such he was enjoined to bring the statue of the goddess to Rome with the greatest pomp and solemnity. Nasica also distinguished himself by the active part which he took in confuting the accusations laid against the two Scipios Africanus and Asiaticus. There was also another of the same name, who distinguished himself by his enmity against the Gracchi, to whom he was nearly related Pat. 2, 1, &c — Flor 2, 15 Liv. 29, 14, &c.—— Publ. Æmilianus, son of Paulus, the conqueror of Perseus, was adopted by the son of Scipio Africanus. He received the same surname as his grandfather, and was called Africanus the younger, on account of his victories over Carthage. Æmilianus first appeared in the Roman armies under his father, and afterwards distinguished himself as a legionary tribune in the Spanish provinces, where he killed a Spaniard of gigantic stature, and obtained a mural crown at the siege of Intercatia. He passed into Africa to demand a reinforcement from king Masinissa, the ally of Rome, and he was the spectator of a long and bloody battle which was fought between that monarch and the Carthaginians, and which soon produced the third Punic war. Some time after Æmilianus was made edile, and next appointed consul, though under the age required for that important office. The surname which he had received from his grandfather, he was doomed lawfully to claim as his own. He was empowered to finish the war with Carthage, and as he was permitted by the senate to choose his colleague, he took with him his friend Lælius, whose father of the same name had formerly enjoyed the confidence and shared the victories of the first Africanus. The siege of Carthage was already begun, but the operations of the Romans were not continued with vigour. Scipio had no sooner appeared before the walls of the enemy, than every communication with the land was cut off, and that they might not have the command of the sea, a stupendous mole was thrown across the harbour with immense labour and expense. This, which might have disheartened the most active enemy, rendered the Carthaginians more eager in the cause of freedom and independence; all the inhabitants, without distinction of rank, age, or sex, employed themselves without cessation to dig another harbour, and to build and equip another fleet. In a short time, in spite of the vigilance and activity of Æmilianus, the Romans were astonished to see another harbour formed, and fifty galleys suddenly issuing under sail, ready for the engagement. This unexpected fleet, by immediately attacking the Roman ships, might have gained the victory but the delay of the Carthaginians proved fatal to their cause, and the enemy had sufficient time to prepare themselves. Scipio soon got the possession of a small eminence in the harbour, and, by the success of his subsequent operations, he broke open one of the gates of the city and entered the streets, where he made his way by fire and sword. The surrender of above 50,000 men was followed by the reduction of the citadel, and the total submission of Carthage, B. C. 147. The captive city was set on fire, and though Scipio was obliged to demolish its very walls to obey the orders of the Romans, yet he wept bitterly over the melancholy and tragical scene; and in bewailing the miseries of Carthage, he expressed his fears lest Rome, in her turn, in some future age, should exhibit such a dreadful conflagration. The return of Æmilianus to Rome was that of another conqueror of Annibal, and like him he was honoured with a magnificent triumph, and received the surname of Africanus. He was not long left in the enjoyment of his glory, before he was called to obtain fresh honours. He was chosen consul a second time, and appointed to finish the war which the Romans had hitherto carried on without success or vigorous exertions against Numantia. The fall of Numantia was more noble than that of the capital of Africa, and the conqueror of Carthage obtained the victory only when the enemies had been consumed by famine or by self destruction, B. C. 133. From his conquests in Spain, Æmilianus was honoured with a second triumph, and with the surname of Numantinus. Yet his popularity was short and, by telling the people that the murder of their favourite, his brother-in-law Gracchus, was lawful, since he was turbulent and inimical to the peace of the republic, Scipio incurred the displeasure of the tribunes, and was received with hisses. His authority for a moment quelled their sedition, when he reproached them for their cowardice, and exclaimed, "Factious wretches, do you think that your clamours can intimidate me, me, whom the fury of your enemies never daunted? Is this the gratitude that you owe to my father Paulus who conquered Macedonia, and to me? Without my family you were slaves. Is this the respect you owe to your deliverers? Is this your affection?" This firmness silenced the murmurs of the assembly, and some time after Scipio retired from the clamours of Rome to Caieta, where, with his friend Lælius, he passed the rest of his time in innocent pleasure and amusement, in diversions which had pleased them when children, and the two greatest men that ruled the state, were often seen on the seashore picking up light pebbles, and throwing them on the smooth surface of the waters. Though fond of retirement and literary ease, yet Scipio often interested himself in the affairs of the state. His enemies accused him of aspiring to the dictatorship, and the clamours were most loud against him, when he had opposed the Sempronian law, and declared himself the patron of the inhabitants of the provinces of Italy. This active part of Scipio was seen with pleasure by the friends of the republic, and not only the senate, but also the citizens, the Latins, and neighbouring states conducted their illustrious friend and patron to his house. It seemed also the universal wish that the troubles might be quieted by the election of Scipio to the dictatorship, and many presumed that that honour would be on the morrow conferred upon him. In this, however, the expectations of Rome were frustrated. Scipio was found dead in his bed to the astonishment of the world; and those who inquired for the causes of this sudden death, perceived violent marks on his neck, and concluded that he had been strangled, B. C. 128. This assassination, as it was then generally believed, was committed by the triumvirs, Papirius Carbo C. Gracchus, and Fulvius Flaccus, who supported the Sempronian law, and by his wife Sempronia, who is charged with having introduced the murderers into his room. No inquiries were made after the authors of his death; Gracchus was the favourite of the mob, and the only atonement which the populace made for the death of Scipio was to attend his funeral, and to show their concern by their cries and loud lamentations. The second Africanus has often been compared to the first of that name; they seemed to be equally great and equally meritorious, and the Romans were unable to distinguish which of the two was entitled to a greater share of their regard and admiration. Æmilianus, like his grandfather, was fond of literature, and he saved from the flames of Carthage many valuable compositions, written by Phœnician and Punic authors. In the midst of his greatness he died poor, and his nephew, Q. Fabius Maximus, who inherited his estate, scarce found in his house thirty-two pounds weight of silver, and two and a half of gold. His liberality to his brother and to his sisters deserves the greatest commendations, and indeed no higher encomium can be passed upon his character, private as well as public, than the words of his rival Metellus, who told his sons, at the death of Scipio, to go and attend the funeral of the greatest man that ever lived or should live in Rome. Liv. 44, &c.—Cic. de Senec. Orat in Brut. &c. Polyb. Appian.—Paterc. 1, 12, &c.—Flor.—A son of the first Africanus, taken captive by Antiochus, king of Syria, and restored to his father without a ransom. He adopted, as his son, young Æmilianus, the son of Paulus Æmilius, who was afterwards surnamed Africanus. Like his father Scipio, he distinguished himself by his fondness for literature, and his valour in the Roman armies. Cic. Sen. 9 et 11. Liv. 40, 42.—Metellus, the father-in-law of Pompey, appointed commander in Macedonia. He was present at the battle of Pharsalia, and afterwards retired to Africa, with Cato. He was defeated by Cæsar at Thapsus. Plut.—Salutio, a mean person in Cæsar's army in Africa. The general appointed him his chief commander, either to ridicule him, or because there was an ancient oracle that declared that the Scipios would ever be victorious in Africa. Plut.—L. Cornelius, a consul who opposed Sylla. He was at last deserted by his army, and proscribed.—The commander of a cohort in the reign of Vitellius.

SCIRA, an annual solemnity observed at Athens in honour of Minerva, or, according to others, of Ceres and Proserpine. It received its name either from Scirus, a small town of Attica, or from a native of Eleusis, called Scirus.

SCIRON, a celebrated thief in Attica, who plundered the inhabitants of the country, and threw them down from the highest rocks into the sea, after he had obliged them to wait upon him and to wash his feet. Theseus attacked him, and treated him as he treated travellers. According to Ovid, the earth as well as the sea, refused to receive the bones of Sciron, which remained for some time suspended in the air, till they were changed into large rocks called Scironia Saxa, situate between Megara and Corinth. There was a road near them which bore the name of Sciron, naturally small and narrow, but afterwards enlarged by the emperor

Adrian Some suppose that Ino threw herself into the sea, from one of these rocks. Sciron had married the daughter of Cychreus a king of Salamis. He was brother-in-law to Telamon the son of Æacus. Ovid. Met. 7, 444.—Heroid. 2, 69 — Strab 9.— Mela, 2, 13.— Plin 2 47.— Seneca, N. Q. 5, 17.

SCODRA, a city of Illyria, the capital of Gentius, situate between the rivers Clausula and Barbana. It was a place of great strength, and might have easily defended itself against the Romans, in their war with Gentius; but instead of offering any resistance it surrendered on the first approach of the enemy's forces. Liv. 44, 31

SCORDUSCI, or Scordisci, a mountain range of Thrace, near Rhodope, and, together with the latter, forming part of the same great central chain Thucyd. 2, 96. — Aristot Met. 1, 13

SCOPAS, an architect and sculptor of Ephesus, for some time employed in making the mausoleum which Artemisia raised to her husband Mol which was reckoned one of the seven wonders of the world. One of his statues of Venus was among the antiquities with which Rome was adorned. Scopas lived about 430 years before Christ. Paus. 1, 43, &c.— Horat Od. 4, 8 — Vitr. 9, 9.——An Æolian who raised some forces to assist Ptolemy Epiphanes, king of Egypt, against his enemies Antiochus and his allies. He afterwards conspired against the Egyptian monarch, and was put to death, B. C 196. Liv 26, 24.

SCORDISCI, a mighty and extensive tribe of Illyria, in the interior of the country, and reaching as far as the Danube. The Scordisci having successively subdued the nations around them, extended their dominions from the borders of Thrace to the Adriatic. They were, however, in their turn conquered by the Romans, though not without numerous struggles and much bloodshed. Strab. 7 Flor à 4.—Liv Epit. 63.

SCOTI, the ancient inhabitants of Scotland It is generally conceived that the earliest inhabitants of Caledonia were of Celtic origin. According to Scottish traditions, the Scoti came from Spain, took possession of Ireland, which, from them, was long called Scotia, and thence invaded the west coast of North Britain, where they settled in the third century. In the reign of Kenneth II, A. D 840, the Scoti and Picti were incorporated, but the kingdom was still denominated Pictland, and did not assume the name it now bears until the reign of Malcolm II. Ammian Marcell. 20, 1 26, 4 27, 8.

SCRIBONIA, a daughter of Scribonius, who married Augustus after he had divorced Claudia. He had by her a daughter, the celebrated Julia. Scribonia was some time after repudiated, that Augustus might marry Livia. She had been married twice before she became the wife of the emperor. Sueton in Aug 62.

SCRIBONIUS. L. Libo, a Roman historian, author of Annals cited by Cicero. Ep ad Att. 13, 31.— Largius Designatianus, a Roman physician, who lived in the time of Claudius, and is said to have attended that emperor to Britain. He wrote a treatise "De Compositione medicamentorum," the best edition of which is that of Rhodius, Patav. 1655, 4to.

SCULTENNA, a river of Cisalpine Gaul, rising on the northern confines of Etruria, and flowing to the east of Mutina into the Padus. It is now the Panaro. Strab 5.—Liv 41, 14.

SCYLLACIUM, a Greek city, on the coast of the Bruttii, in a south-west direction from Crotona, and communicating its name to the neighbouring gulf (Sinus Scyllaceus) According to Strabo, it was colonized by the Athenians under Menestheus, but he neither mentions the time, nor the circumstances which led to its establishment. Servius, however, observes, that these Athenians were returning from Africa. At a later period it received a Roman colony. Scyllacium was the birth place of Cassiodorus. It is now Squillace Strab. 6. Serv. ad Virg. Æn. 3, 553. Vell. Paterc. 1, 15.

SCYLAX a celebrated geographer and mathematician, was a native of Caryanda in Caria; and is noticed by Herodotus, and by Suidas, the latter of whom has evidently confounded different persons of the same name." A periplus remains bearing the name of Scylax, which is a brief survey of the countries along the shores of the Mediterranean and Euxine seas, together with part of the western coast of Africa, surveyed by Hanno. It has come down to us in a corrupted state. The best edition is that of Gronovius, 4to L. Bat. 1677. Herod. 4, 44.

SCYLLA, a daughter of Nisus king of Megara, who became enamoured of Minos, as that monarch besieged her father's capital. To make him sensible of her passion, she informed him that she would deliver Megara into his hands, if he promised to marry her Minos consented, and as the prosperity of Megara depended on the golden hair, which was on the head of Nisus, Scylla cut it off as her father was asleep, and from that moment the sallies of the Megareans were unsuccessful, and the enemy easily became masters of the place. Scylla was disappointed in her expectations, and Minos treated her with such contempt and ridicule, that she threw herself from a tower into the sea, or, according to other accounts, she was changed into a lark by the gods, and her father into a hawk. Ovid. Trist 2 393.— Paus 2, 34.—Propert. El. 3, 19, 21 — Hygin. fab. 198. Virg. G. 1, 405, &c —— A daughter of Typhon, or, as some say, of Phorcys, who was greatly loved by Glaucus, one of the deities of the sea. Scylla scorned the addresses of Glaucus, and the god, to render her more propitious, applied to Circe, whose knowledge of herbs and incantations was universally admired. Circe no sooner saw him than she became enamoured of him, and instead of giving him the required assistance, she attempted to make him forget Scylla, but in vain. To punish her rival, Circe poured the juice of some poisonous herbs into the waters of the fountain where Scylla bathed, and no sooner had the nymph touched the place, than she found every part of her body below the waist, changed into frightful monsters like dogs, which never ceased barking The rest of her body assumed an equally hideous form. She found herself supported by twelve feet, and she had six different heads, each with three rows of teeth. This sudden metamorphosis so terrified her, that she threw herself into that part of the sea which separates the coast of Italy and Sicily, where she was changed into rocks, which continued to bear her name, and which were universally deemed by the ancients as very dangerous to sailors, as well as the whirlpool of Charybdis on the coast of Sicily. During a tempest the waves are described by modern navigators as roaring dreadfully when driven into the rough and uneven cavities of the rock. Homer. Od. 12, 85.—*Ovid. SCYLLÆUM, a promontory of Argolis, opposite the Attic promontory of Sunium, and said to have derived its name from Scylla, the daughter of Nisus. It formed, together with the promontory of Sunium, the entrance of the Saronic gulf, and closed also the bay of Hermione. Strab. 8.

SCYLLIAS, a celebrated swimmer of Scione, who enriched himself by diving after the goods which had been shipwrecked in the Persian ships near Pelium. It is said that he could dive eighty stadia under the water. Herod 8, 8.

SCYLURUS, a monarch who left eighty sons He called them to his bed side as he expired, and by enjoining them to break a bundle of sticks tied together, and afterwards separately he convinced them, that when altogether firmly united, their power would be insuperable, but if ever disunited, they would fall an easy prey to their enemies. Plut. de garr.

SCYRIAS, a name applied to Deidamia as a native of Scyros. Ovid. A. 1, 682.

SCYROS, an island of the Ægean Sea, northeast of Eubœa, and now called Skyro. It was the country of king Lycomedes, where Achilles lay concealed in the habit of a girl, to escape going to the Trojan war. Here also Theseus, king of Athens, retired into exile, and is said to have terminated his existence by falling down a precipice Scyros was celebrated for a superior breed of goats, and for its wine and marble; which were in much request It was anciently inhabited by a set of Dolopian robbers, whom the Athenians, under Cimon, expelled. Strab 9 —Homer Od. 10, 508.—Lycophr. 1324.—Thucyd. 1 98.

SCYTHÆ, the inhabitants of Scythia. Vid Scythia.

SCYTHIA, a general name given by the ancient Greeks and Romans to a large portion of Asia, and divided by them into Scythia intra and extra Imaum, that is, on either side of mount Imaus. Scythia intra Imaum corresponded generally with the modern province of Independent Tartary and the north western portion of Mongolia. it touched to the west on Sarmatia Asiatica, to the south on Hyrcania, Sogdiana and the dominions of the Sacæ, and to the east on Scythia extra Imaum. Scythia extra Imaum touched to the west upon Scythia intra Imaum and upon the dominions of the Sacæ to the south upon India, and to the east upon Serica It corresponded with the central part of Mongolia The Scythians were divided into many tribes, who possessed no towns, but lived a wandering nomadic life They inured themselves to fatigue and labour, and are represented by some authors to have been as barbarous and savage, as to have fed upon human flesh, and to have drunk the blood of their enemies. Other accounts, however, state them to have lived upon milk, and to have clothed themselves with the skins of their cattle, to have utterly despised money, and to have instinctively practised that philosophy and virtue, which other nations acquired only by long study. The Scythians made several irruptions upon the more southern provinces of Asia, especially B. C. 624, when they remained in possession of Asia Minor for twenty-eight years; and we find them at different periods extending their conquests in Europe, and penetrating as far as Egypt Their government was monarchical, and the deference which they paid to their sovereigns was unparalleled When the king died, his body was carried through every province, where it was received in solemn procession, and afterwards buried. Herod 1, 4, &c. —*Val. SEJANUS, ÆLIUS, a native of Vulsinii in Etruria who distinguished himself in the court of Tiberius. His father's name was Seius Strabo, a Roman knight, commander of the prætorian guards. His mother was descended from the Junian family. Sejanus first gained the favour of Caius Cæsar, the grandson of Augustus, but afterwards he attached himself to the interest and the views of Tiberius, who then sat on the imperial throne. The emperor, who was naturally of a suspicious temper, was free and open with Sejanus, and while he distrusted others he communicated his greatest secrets to this fawning favourite. Sejanus improved this confidence, and when he had found that he possessed the esteem of Tiberius, he next endeavoured to become the favourite of the soldiers and the darling of the senate. As commander of the prætorian guards he was the second man in Rome, and in that important office he made use of insinuations and every mean artifice to make himself beloved. His affability and condescension gained him the hearts of the common soldiers, and by appointing his own favourites and adherents to places of trust and honour, all the officers and centurions of the army became devoted to his interest. The views of Sejanus in this were well known; yet to advance with more success, he attempted to gain the affection of the senators. In this he met with no opposition. A man who has the disposal of places of honour and dignity, and who has the command of the public money, cannot but be the favourite of those who are in need of his assistance. It is even said, that Sejanus gained to his views all the wives of the senators, by a private and most secret promise of marriage to each of them whenever he had made himself independent and sovereign of Rome. Yet however successful with the best and noblest families in the empire, Sejanus had to con but numbers in the house of the emperor, but these seeming obstacles were soon removed. All the children and grand children of Tiberius were sacrificed to the ambition of the favourite under various pretences, and Drusus, the son of the emperor, by striking Sejanus made his destruction sure and inevitable. Livia the wife of Drusus, was gained by Sejanus and though the mother of many children she was prevailed upon to assist her adulterer in the murder of her husband, and she consented to marry him when Drusus was dead. No sooner was Drusus poisoned than Sejanus openly declared his wish to marry Livia. He was strongly opposed by Tiberius; and the emperor, by recommending Germanicus to the senators for his successor rendered Sejanus bold and determined. He was more urgent in his demands, and when he could not gain the consent of the emperor he persuaded him to retire to solitude from the noise of Rome and the troubles of the government. Tiberius, naturally fond of ease and luxury yielded to his representations, and retired to Campania leaving Sejanus at the head of the empire. This was highly gratifying to the favourite and he was now without a master. Prudence and moderation might have made him what he wished to be; but Sejanus offended the whole empire when he declared that he was emperor of Rome, and Tiberius only the dependent prince of the island of Capreæ, where he had retired. Tiberius was upon this fully convinced of the designs of Sejanus; and when he had been informed that his favourite had had the meanness and audacity to ridicule him by introducing him on the stage, the emperor ordered him to be accused before the senate. Sejanus was deserted by all his pretended friends, as soon as by fortune; and the man who aspired to the empire, and who called himself the favourite of the people, the darling of the prætorian guards, and the companion of Tiberius, was seized without resistance, and the same day strangled in prison, A. D 31. His remains were exposed to the fury and insolence of the populace, and afterwards thrown into the Tiber. His children and all his relations were involved in his ruin, and Tiberius sacrificed to his resentment and suspicions, all those who were even connected with Sejanus, or had shared his favours and enjoyed his confidence. Tacit. Ann 3 &c.—Dio. 58 Suet in Tib.

SEIUS, CN, a Roman who had a famous horse of large size and uncommon beauty. He was put to death by Antony, and it was observed, that whoever obtained possession of his horse, which was called Sejanus equus, became unfortunate, and lost all his property, with every member of his family. Hence arose the proverb, ille homo habet Sejanum equum applied to such as were oppressed with misfortunes. Aul. Gell. 3, 9.

SELEUCENA, or SELEUCIS, a country of Syria, in Asia. Vid. Seleucis.

SELEUCIA, a famous city of Asia, built by Seleucus Nicator and situate on the western bank of the Tigris, about forty-five miles to the north of ancient Babylon, to the honours of which it succeeded. It was the capital of the Macedonian conquests in Upper Asia, and the seat of the Seleucidan dynasty. Many ages after the fall of the Macedonian empire, it retained the character of a flourishing Greek colony, and is said to have contained 600 000 citizens, governed by a senate of 300 nobles. It was taken by the Romans in the reign of Marcus Aurelius, and given up to pillage and conflagration, when 300,000 of the inhabitants are stated to have been massacred. It is now, together with Ctesiphon on the opposite side of the river, a heap of rubbish, the two ruins being known by the common name of Al Modain or "the two cities." Plin. 6, 26.—Dio Cas 68, 30, 71, &c.—Eutrop. 8 5.—A city of Cilicia Trachea, a short distance to the north of the mouth of the Calycadnus. It was built by Seleucus Nicator, and is sometimes called, for distinction sake, Seleucia Trachea. It is still named Selefkieh. Amm. Marcell. 14, 25.—A city of Apamene, not far from the city of Apamea. It was sometimes called Seleucia ad Belum. Plin 5, 24.—A city of Syria, on the sea-coast, near the mouth of the Orontes, and south-west of Antioch. It was called Seleucia Pieria, from its situation at the foot of mount Pierus. It was founded by Seleucus Nicator, and was an exceedingly strong place. Strab. 16.—Polyb. 5, 59.—Mela, 1, 12.—Plin. 5, 18.

SELEUCIDÆ, a surname given to those monarchs who sat on the throne of Syria which was founded by Seleucus, the son of Antiochus, from whom the word is derived. The era of the Seleucidæ begins with the taking of Babylon by Seleucus, B. C. 312, and ends at the conquest of Syria by Pompey, B C 65. The order in which these monarchs reigned, is shown in the account of Syria. Vid. Syria.

SELEUCIS, a division of Syria, which received its name from Seleucus, the founder of the Syrian empire, after the death of Alexander the Great. It was also called Tetrapolis, from the four cities which it contained, called also sister cities; Seleucia called after Seleucus, Antioch called after his father, Laodicea after his mother, and Apamea after his wife

SELEUCUS, 1st, one of the captains of Alexander the Great, surnamed Nicator, or Victorious, was son of Antiochus After the king's death, he received Babylon as his province; but his ambitious views, and his attempt to destroy Eumenes as he passed through his territories, rendered him so unpopular, that he fled for safety to the court of his friend Ptolemy, king of Egypt. He was soon after enabled to recover Babylon, which Antigonus had seized in his absence and he increased his dominions by the immediate conquest of Media, and some of the neighbouring provinces. When he had strengthened himself in his empire, Seleucus imitated the example of the rest of the generals of Alexander, and assumed the title of independent monarch. He afterwards made war against Antigonus, with the united forces of Ptolemy, Cassander, and Lysimachus; and after this monarch had been conquered and slain, his territories were divided among his victorious enemies. When Seleucus became master of Syria, he built a city there, which he called Antioch, in honour of his father, and made it the capital of his dominions. He also made war against Demetrius and Lysimachus, though he had originally married Stratonice, the daughter of the former, and had lived in the closest friendship with the latter. Seleucus was at last murdered by one of his servants called Ptolemy Ceraunus, a man on whom he bestowed the greatest favours, and whom he had distinguished by acts of the most unbounded confidence According to Arrian, Seleucus was the greatest and most powerful of the princes who inherited the Macedonian empire after the death of Alexander His benevolence has been commended; and it has been observed, that he conquered not to enslave nations, but to make them more happy. He founded no less than thirty four cities in different parts of his empire, which he peopled with Greek colonies, whose national industry, learning, religion, and spirit, were communicated to the indolent and luxurious inhabitants of Asia. Seleucus was a great benefactor to the Greeks; he restored to the Athenians the library and the statues which Xerxes had carried away from their city when he invaded Greece, and among them were those of Harmodius and Aristogiton. Seleucus was murdered 280 years before the Christian era, in the 32d year of his reign, and the 78th, or according to others the 73d year of his age, as he was going to conquer Macedonia, where he intended to finish his days in peace and tranquillity in the province where he was born. He was succeeded by Antiochus Soter. Justin. 13, 4. 15, 4. 16, 1. &c. — Plut in Dem — Plin. 6, 17.—Paus 8, 51. Joseph. Ant. 12 — The 2d, surnamed Callinicus, succeeded his father Antiochus Theus on the throne of Syria. He attempted to make war against Ptolemy, king of Egypt, but his fleet was shipwrecked in a violent storm, and his armies soon after conquered by his enemy. He was at last taken prisoner by Arsaces, an officer who made himself powerful by the dissensions which reigned in the house of the Seleucidæ, between the two brothers, Seleucus and Antiochus, and after he had been a prisoner for some time in Parthia, he died of a fall from his horse, B. C. 226, after a reign of twenty years. Seleucus had received the surname of Pogon, from his long beard, and that of Callinicus, ironically to express his very unfortunate reign. He had married Laodice, the sister or one of his generals, by whom he had two sons, Seleucus and Antiochus, and a daughter whom he gave in marriage to Mithridates king of Pontus. Ser b. 16 — Justin. 27. - Appian de Syr. — The 3d, succeeded his father Seleucus 2d, on the throne of Syria and received the surname of Ceraunus, by antiphrasis, as he was a very weak, timid, and irresolute monarch He was murdered by two of his officers, after a reign of three years, B C 223, and his brother Antiochus, though only fifteen years old, ascended the throne, and rendered himself so celebrated that he acquired the name of the Great. Appian — The 4th, succeeded his father Antiochus the Great, on the throne of Syria. He was surnamed Philopater, or, according to Josephus, Soter. His empire had been weakened by the Romans when he became monarch and the yearly tribute of a thousand talents to those victorious enemies, concurred in lessening his power and consequence among nations. Seleucus was poisoned after a reign of twelve years, B C 175 His son Demetrius had been sent to Rome, there to receive his education, and he became a prince of great abilities. Strab 16 — Justin. 32. — Appian — The 5th, succeeded his father Demetrius Nicator on the throne of Syria, in the 20th year of his age He was put to death in the first year of his reign by Cleopatra, his mother, who had also sacrificed her husband to her ambition. He is not reckoned by many historians in the number of the Syrian monarchs. — The 6th, one of the Seleucidæ son of Antiochus Grypus, killed his uncle Antiochus Cyzicenus who wished to obtain the crown of Syria He was some time after banished from his kingdom by Antiochus Pius, son of Cyzicenus, and fled to Cilicia, where he was burned in a palace by the inhabitants, B. C. 93 Appian Joseph — A prince of Syria, to whom the Egyptians offered the crown of which they had robbed Antiochus. Seleucus accepted it, but he soon disgusted his subjects, and received the surname of Cybiosactes, or Scullion, for his meanness and avarice. He was at last murdered by Berenice, whom he had married.

SELGE, the greatest city of Pisidia, situate north of the Eurymedon. It was founded by the Lacedæmonians, and was remarkable for the intrepidity of its inhabitants, as well as for their sobriety and honesty. Strab. 12. — Polyb 5, 72 77.

SELINUNS, or SELINUS, (untis,) a large and flourishing city of Sicily, situate on the southern shore of the western part of the island, and in a south-west direction from Lilybæum It was founded by a Doric colony from Megara or Hybla, on the eastern coast of Sicily, 100 years after the establishment of the parent city, which latter event took place about the eighteenth Olympiad It was demolished by the Carthaginians, who slew 16 000 of its inhabitants, and took 5000 prisoners. It was rebuilt by Hermocrates and again destroyed by the Carthaginians who razed its walls and temples. The ruins of Selinus exist near what is called Torre di Pollara and their modern appellation is Pilieri dei Conte Tetrano Thucyd 6 4. Dnod. Sic, 13. 42 57 et 59. 24, 1 ——A city of Cilicia Trachea, the most westerly place in that province with the exception of Laertes, and situated on the coast. It was surrounded on almost every side by the sea, and seated on a precipitous rock, by which position it was rendered nearly impregnable. The emperor Trajan died here; and from him the place took the new name of Trajanopolis. The modern name is Selindy. Liv. 33, 20.

SYLLASIA, a town of Laconia, north-east of Sparta, and commanding one of the principal passes in the country. It was situate near the confluence of the Oenus and Gongylus, in a valley confined between two mountains, named Evas and Olympus It commanded the only road by which an army could enter Laconia from the north, and was therefore a position of great importance for the defence of the capital. Polyb 2 6 – Xen Hist Gr 5, 5, 17.

SYLLIS, a river of Elis, in the Peloponnesus, rising in mount Pholoe, and falling into the sea below the Peneus. Near its mouth stood the town of Ephyre Strab 8.

SELYMBRIA, now Silivria, a city of Thrace, founded by the Megarensians at a still earlier period than Byzantium. Its name signifies "The city of Selys," bria signifying "a city" in the language of the Thracians Herod 6, 33.

SEMELE, a daughter of Cadmus by Hermione, the daughter of Mars and Venus She was tenderly beloved by Jupiter, but Juno who was always jealous of her husband's amours, and who hated the house of Cadmus because they were related to the goddess of beauty, determined to punish this successful rival She borrowed the girdle of Ate, which contained every wickedness, deceit, and perfidy, and in the form of Beroe, Semele's nurse, she visited the house of Jupiter's mistress. Semele listened with attention to the artful admonitions of the false Beroe, and was at last persuaded to entreat her lover to come to her arms with the same majesty as he approached Juno. This rash request was heard with horror by Jupiter; but as he had sworn by the Styx to grant Semele whatever she required, he came to her bed attended by the clouds, the lightning, and thunderbolts. The mortal nature of Semele could not endure so much majesty, and she was instantly consumed by fire. The child, however, of which she was pregnant, was saved from the flames by Mercury, or, according to others, by Dirce, one of the nymphs of the Acheloüs and Jupiter placed him in his thigh the rest of the time which he ought to have been in his mother's womb. This child was called Bacchus, or Dionysius Semele immediately after death was honoured with immortality under the name of Thyone Some, however, suppose that she remained in the infernal regions till Bacchus her son was permitted to bring her back. There were in the Temple of Diana at Troezene, two altars raised to the infernal gods, one of which was over an aperture through which as Pausanias reports Bacchus returned from hell with his mother. Semele was particularly worshipped at Brasiæ in Laconia, where according to a certain tradition, she had been driven by the winds with her son, after Cadmus had exposed her on the sea, on account of her incontinent amour with Jupiter The mother of Bacchus, though she received divine honours, had no temples; she had a statue in a temple of Ceres, at Thebes in Boeotia Paus. 3, 24, 9, 5. — *Hom. SEMIRAMIS, a celebrated queen of Assyria, daughter of the goddess Derceto, by a young Assyrian. She was exposed in a desert, but her life was preserved by doves for one whole year, till Simmas, one of the shepherds of Ninus, found her and brought her up as his own child. Semiramis, when grown up, married Menones, the governor of Nineveh, and accompanied him to the siege of Bactra, where, by her advice and prudent directions, she hastened the king's operations, and took the city. These eminent services, but chiefly her uncommon beauty, endeared her to Ninus. The monarch asked her of her husband, and offered him his daughter Sosana instead; but Menones, who tenderly loved Semiramis, refused, and when Ninus had added threats to intreaties, he hung himself. No sooner was Menones dead than Semiramis, who was of an aspiring soul, married Ninus, by whom she had a son called Ninyas. Ninus was so fond of Semiramis, that at her request he resigned the crown to her, and commanded her to be proclaimed queen and sole empress of Assyria. Of this, however, he had cause to repent; Semiramis put him to death, the better to establish herself on the throne, and when she had no enemies to fear at home, she began to repair the capital of her empire, and by her means Babylon became the most superb and magnificent city in the world She visited every part of her dominions, and left every where immortal monuments of her greatness and benevolence. To render the roads passable and communication easy, she hollowed mountains and filled up valleys, and water was conveyed at a great expence, by large and convenient aqueducts, to barren deserts and unfruitful plains She was not less distinguished as a warrior. Many of the neighbouring nations were conquered; and when Semiramis was once told, as she was dressing her hair, that Babylon had revolted, she left her toilette with precipitation, and though only half dressed, she refused to have the rest of her head adorned before the sedition was quelled, and tranquillity re-established. Semiramis has been accused of licentiousness, and some authors have observed that she regularly called the strongest and stoutest men in her army to her arms, and afterwards put them to death, that they might not be living witnesses of her incontinence. Her passion for her son was also unnatural, and it was this criminal propensity which induced Ninyas to destroy his mother with his own hands. Some say that Semiramis was changed into a dove after death, and received immortal honours in Assyria. It is supposed that she lived about 1965 years before the Christian era, and that she died in the 62d year of her age, and the 25th of her reign. Many fabulous reports have been propagated about Semiramis, and some have declared that for some time she disguised herself, and passed for her son Ninyas. *Val. SEMNONES, a people of Germany, who boasted of being the most illustrious and ancient among the Suevi. They inhabited Lusatia, and part of Mittelmark, and extended from the Elbe to the Oder. Tacit. de Mor. Germ. 39.

SEMONES, inferior deities of Rome, that were not in the number of the twelve great gods. Among these were Faunus, the Satyrs, Priapus, Vertumnus, Janus, Pan, Silenus, and all such illustrious heroes as had received divine honours after death. The word seems to be the same as semihomines, because they were inferior to the supreme gods and superior to men.

SEMONANCTUS, one of the gods of the Romans among the Indigetes, or such as were born and educated in their country.

SEMPRONIA, a Roman matron, daughter of Scipio Africanus, and mother of the two Gracchi, celebrated for her learning and her private as well as public virtues.——Also a sister of the Gracchi, who is accused of having assisted the triumvirs Carbo, Gracchus, and Flaccus, to murder her husband, Scipio Africanus the Younger. The name of Sempronia was common to the female descendants of the family of the Sempronii, Gracchi, and Scipios.

SEMPRONIA LEX, de magistratibus, by C. Sempronius Gracchus, the tribune, A. U. C. 630, ordained that no person who had been legally deprived of a magistracy for misdemeanours should be capable of bearing an office again. This law was afterwards repealed by the author.——Another, de civitate, by the same, A. U. C. 630. It ordained that no capital judgment should be passed over a Roman citizen without the concurrence and authority of the senate. There were also some other regulations included in this law.——Another, de comitiis, by the same, A. U. C. 630. It ordained that in giving their votes, the centuries should be chosen by lot, and not give it according to the order of their classes.——Another, de comitiis, by the same, the same year, which granted to the Latin allies of Rome, the privilege of giving votes at elections, as if they were Roman citizens.——Another, de provinciis, by the same, A. U. C 630. It enacted that the senators should appoint provinces for the consuls every year before their election.——Another, called agraria prima, by T Sempronius Gracchus the tribune, A. U. C 620. [Vid Agrariæ Leges.]——Another, called agraria altera, by the same. It required that all the ready money which was found in the treasury of Attalus, king of Pergamus, who had left the Romans his heirs, should be divided among the poorer citizens of Rome, to supply them with all the various instruments requisite in husbandry, and that the lands of that monarch should be farmed by the Roman censors, and the money drawn from thence should be divided among the people.——Another, frumentaria, by C. Sempronius Gracchus. It required that a certain quantity of corn should be distributed among the people, so much to every individual, for which it was required that they should only pay the trifling sum of a semissis and a triens.——Another, de usuris, by M. Sempronius, the tribune, A. U. C. 560. It ordained that in lending money to the Latins and the allies of Rome, the Roman laws should be observed as well as among the citizens.——Another, de judiciis, by the tribune C. Sempronius, A. U. C. 630. It required that the right of judging, which had been assigned to the senatorian order by Romulus, should be transferred from them to the Roman knights.——Another, militaris, by the same, A U C. 630. It enacted that the soldiers should be clothed at the public expence without any diminution of their usual pay. It also ordered that no person should be obliged to serve in the army before the age of seventeen.

SEMPRONIUS, A. ATRATINUS, a senator who opposed the Agrarian law, which was proposed by the consul Cassius soon after the election of the tribunes.——L. Atratinus, a consul A U. C 311. He was one of the first censors with his colleague in the consulship, Papirius.——Catus, a consul summoned before an assembly of the people, because he had fought with ill success against the Volsci.——Blæsus, a consul who obtained a triumph for some victories, gained in Sicily.——Sophus, a consul against the Æqui. He also fought against the Picentes, and during the engagement there was a dreadful earthquake. The soldiers were terrified, but Sophus encouraged them, and observed that the earth trembled only for fear of changing its old masters.——A man who proposed a law that no person should dedicate a temple or altar, without the previous approbation of the magistrates, A U. C. 449. He repudiated his wife because she had gone to see a spectacle without his permison or knowledge.——Rufus, a senator, banished from the senate, because he had killed a crane to serve him as food.——A legionary tribune, who led away from Cannæ the remaining part of the soldiers who had not been killed by the Carthaginians. He was afterwards consul, and fought in the field against Annibal with great success. He was killed in Spain.——Tiberius Longus, a Roman consul defeated by the Carthaginians in an engagement which he had begun against the approbation of his colleague C. Scipio. He afterwards obtained victories over Hanno and the Gauls.——Tiberius Gracchus, a consul who defeated the Carthaginians and the Campanians. He was afterwards betrayed by Fulvius, a Lucanian, into the hands of the Carthaginians, and was killed, after he had made a long and bloody resistance against the enemy. Annibal showed great honour to his remains, a funeral pile was raised at the head of the camp, and the enemy's cavalry walked round it in solemn procession.——The father of the Gracchi. Vid Gracchus.

SENA, Julia, a city of Etruria to the east of Volaterræ. The designation Julia implies a colony founded by Julius or Augustus Cæsar. It is now called Sienna. Tacit. H. 4, 45.—Flor. 3, 5.——Gallica, a city of Umbria, in Italy, on the sea-coast, north-west of Ancona, and near the mouth of the river Misus. It was built by the Senones, and after their extermination made a Roman colony. Its modern name is Smigaglia. Polyb. 2, 19.

SENATUS the chief council of the state among the Romans. The members of this body called senatores on account of their age, and patres on account of their authority were of the greatest consequence in the republic. The senate was first instituted by Romulus, to govern the city, and to preside over the affairs of the state during his absence. This was continued by his successors, but Tarquin the second disdained to consult them, and by having his own council chosen from his favourites, and from men who were totally devoted to his interest, he diminished the authority and the consequence of the senators, and slighted the concurrence of the people.

The senators whom Romulus created were an hundred, to whom he afterwards added the same number when the Sabines had migrated to Rome. This is rather doubtful, since Livy expressly states that there were only 100 senators at the death of Romulus, and that their number was increased by Tullus Hostilius, after the destruction of Alba. Tarquinius Priscus added 100 more. After the expulsion of the last Tarquin, whose tyranny had thinned the patricians as well as the plebeians, 164 new senators were chosen to complete the 300; and as they were called conscripti, the senate ever afterwards consisted of members who were denominated patres and conscripti. The number of 300 continued with small variation to the time of Sylla, who increased it, but how many he added is uncertain. It appears that there were at least above 400. In the time of Julius Cæsar, the number of senators was increased to 900, and after his death to 1000, but, many worthless persons having obtained admittance into the senate during the civil wars, Augustus reduced the number to 600. The place of a senator was always bestowed upon merit. The monarchs had the privilege of choosing the members, and after the expulsion of the Tarquins, it was one of the rights of the consuls, till the election of the censors, who, from their office, seemed most capable of making choice of men whose character was irreproachable, whose morals were pure, and relations honourable. Sometimes the assembly of the people elected senators, but it was only upon some extraordinary occasions; there was also a dictator chosen to fill up the number of the senate after the battle of Cannæ. Only particular families were admitted into the senate, and when the plebeians were permitted to share the honours of the state, it was then required that they should be born of free citizens. It was also required that the candidates should be knights before their admission into the senate. They were to be above the age of twenty-five, and to have previously passed through the inferior offices of quæstor, tribune of the people, ædile, prætor, and consul. Some, however, suppose that the senators whom Romulus chose were all old men; yet his successors neglected this, and often men who were below the age of twenty-five were admitted by courtesy into the senate. The dignity of a senator could not be supported without the possession of 40,000 sesterces, or about 700*l.* English money; and therefore such as squandered away their money, and whose fortune was reduced below this sum, were generally struck out of the list of senators. This regulation was not made in the first ages of the republic, when the Romans boasted of their poverty. The senators were not permitted to be of any trade or profession. They were distinguished from the rest of the people by their dress. They wore the laticlave, a white tunic, or waistcoat, with an oblong broad stripe of purple, like a ribband, sewed to it, it was broad, to distinguish it from the equites, who wore a narrow one, half boots of a black colour, with a crescent or silver buckle in the form of a C, indicative of the ancient number of the senate, one hundred, (Centum.) They had the sole right of feasting publicly in the capitol in ceremonial habits, they sat in curule chairs, and, at the representation of plays and public spectacles, they were honoured with particular seats. Whenever they travelled abroad, even on their own business they were maintained at the public expence, and always found provisions for themselves and their attendants ready prepared on the road; a privilege that was generally termed free legation. On public festivals they wore the prætexta, or long white robe, with purple borders. The right of convocating the senate belonged only to the monarchs; and after the expulsion of the Tarquins, to the consuls, the dictator, master of the horse, governor of Rome, and tribunes of the people; but no magistrate could exercise this privilege except in the absence of a superior officer, the tribunes excepted. The time of meeting was generally three times a month, on the calends, nones, and ides. Under Augustus they were not assembled on the nones. It was requisite that the place where they assembled should have been previously consecrated by the augur. This was generally in the temple of Concord, of Jupiter Capitolinus, Apollo, Castor and Pollux, &c., or in the Curiæ called Hostilia, Julia, Pompeia, &c. When audience was given to foreign ambassadors, the senators assembled without the walls of the city, either in the temples of Bellona or of Apollo; and the same ceremony as to their meeting was also observed when they transacted business with their generals, as the ambassadors of foreign nations, and the commanders of armies, while in commission, were not permitted to appear within the walls of the city. To render their decrees valid and authentic, a certain number of members was requisite and such as were absent without some proper cause, were always fined. In the reign of Augustus, 400 senators were requisite to make a senate. Nothing was transacted before sunrise, or after sun set. In their office the senators were the guardians of religion. They disposed of the provinces as they pleased, they prorogued the assemblies of the people; they appointed thanksgivings, nominated their ambassadors, distributed the public money; and, in short, had the management of every thing political or civil in the republic, except the creating of magistrates, the enacting of laws, and the declarations of war or peace, which were confined to the assemblies of the people. Rank was always regarded in their meetings. The chief magistrates of the state, such as the consuls, the prætors, and censors, sat first; after these the inferior magistrates, such as the ædiles and quæstors, and last of all those that had been exercised no office in the state. Their opinions were originally collected, each according to his age; but when the office of censor was instituted, the opinion of the princeps senatus, or the person whose name stood first on the censor's list, was first consulted, and afterwards those who were of consular dignity, each in their respective order. In the age of Cicero the consuls elect were first consulted; and in the age of Cæsar, he was permitted to speak first till the end of the year, on whom the consul had originally conferred that honour. Under the emperors the same rules were observed, but the consuls were generally consulted before all others. When any public matter was introduced into the senate, which was always called referre ad senatum, any senator whose opinion was asked, was permitted to speak upon it as long as he pleased; and on that account it was often usual for the senators to protract their speeches till was too late to determine. When the question was put, they passed to the side of that speaker whose opinion they approved, and a majority of votes was easily collected, without the trouble of counting the numbers. This mode of proceeding was called pedibus in alterius sententiam ire; and therefore on that account, the senators who had not the privilege of speaking, but only the right of giving a silent vote, such as bore some curule honours, and on that account were permitted to sit in the senate, but not to deliberate, were denominated pedarii senatores. After the majority had been known, the matter was determined, and a senatusconsultum was immediately written by the clerks of the house, at the foot of the chief magistrates, and it was signed by all the principal members of the house. When there was not a sufficient number of members to make a senate, the decision was called senatus auctoritas; but it was of no consequence if it did not afterwards pass into a senatusconsultum. The tribunes of the people, by the word veto, could stop the debates, and the decrees of the assembled senate, as also any one who was of equal authority with him who had proposed the matter. The senatusconsulta were left in the custody of the consuls, who could suppress or preserve them; but about the year of Rome 304, they were always deposited in the temple of Ceres, and afterwards in the treasury, by the ædiles of the people. The degradation of the senators was made by the censor, by omitting their names when he called over the list of the senate. This was called praeterire. A senator could be again introduced into the senate if he could repair his character, or fortune, which had been the causes why the censor had lawfully called him unqualified, and had challenged his opposition. The meeting of the senate was often sudden, except the particular times already mentioned, upon any emergency. After the death of Julius Cæsar, they were not permitted to meet on the ides of March, which were called parricidium, because on that day the dictator had been assassinated. The sons of senators, after they had put on the toga virilis, were permitted to come into the senate, but this was after and limited. [Vid. Papirius.] The rank and authority of the senators, which were so conspicuous in the first ages of the republic, and which caused the minister of Pyrrhus to declare, that the Roman senate was a venerable assembly of kings, dwindled into nothing under the emperors. Men of the lowest character were admitted into the senate. The emperors took pleasure in robbing this illustrious body of their privileges and authority, and the senators themselves, by their manners and servility, contributed as much as the tyranny of the sovereign to diminish their own consequence; and by applauding the follies of a Nero, and the cruelties of a Domitian, they convinced the world that they no longer possessed sufficient prudence or authority to be consulted on matters of weight and importance. In the election of successors to the imperial purple after Augustus, the approbation of the senate was consulted, but it was only a matter of courtesy, and the concurrence of a body of men was little regarded who were without power, and under the control of a mercenary army. The title of clarissimus was given to the senators under the emperors, and indeed this was the only distinction which they had in compensation for the loss of their independence. The senate was abolished by Justinian, thirteen centuries after its first institution by Romulus.

SENĒCA, M. ANNÆUS, a celebrated philosopher, was born at Corduba, near the commencement of the Christian era. His father was a man of equestrian rank, and an eminent orator, of whom some declamations and controversies are extant. His mother was Helvia, a Spanish lady of distinction. Being educated at Rome, he was early initiated in the study of eloquence by his father, and other masters; but his own propensity led him to devote his talents to the study of philosophy. He first joined the Pythagoreans, whom he soon left for the Stoics: he, however, confined himself to no sect, but extended his inquiries to all the systems of Grecian philosophy. In conformity to the wishes of his father, he pleaded some time in the courts of justice, and acquired by the practice a considerable reputation; but it is thought he relinquished the bar, through fear of the jealousy of Caligula, who was ambitious of oratorical fame. Entering into public life, he obtained the office of quæstor, and had risen to some consequence in the court of Claudius, when, at the instigation of Messalina, he was accused of an adulterous commerce with Julia, the daughter of Germanicus, and was banished to the island of Corsica. In that island he remained in exile eight years, consoling himself with the maxims of philosophy, though never resigned to the severity of his lot, as may be inferred from his complaints, and his abject application to the emperor for pardon. Upon the marriage of Claudius to his second wife Agrippina, Seneca was through her influence, recalled, and, after being raised to the prætorship, was appointed preceptor to her son Nero; while Burrhus was made his governor and military instructor. They are said to have acted with the most perfect unanimity in restraining him from those vices, to which his situation and inclination prompted him, and obtained an ascendency over him, to which is attributed the flattering promise of the first years of his reign. When Nero began to display his real character, his quarrels with his mother, who was as violent and wicked as her son, laid his governors under great difficulties. Once they were the means of reconciling them, but at length the breach was irreparable, and Nero determined to free himself from one whom he regarded as a dangerous competitor, by the horrid crime of matricide. Seneca and Burrhus were apprised of his intentions, and did not oppose it as they ought to have done; and after the deed was perpetrated, Seneca wrote to the senate, in the name of the emperor, to justify it. Burrhus died very soon, and the influence of Seneca over his pupil was entirely lost; nevertheless the tyrant heaped upon his preceptor unbounded wealth, which not only exposed the character of the philosopher to severe censure, but was in the end the principal cause of his destruction. Finding that he was an object of envy to the favourites of the prince, he requested permission to retire from court, and refund all that he had received from the imperial liberality. Nero assured him of his continued regard, and would not hear of the proffered restitution of rewards, which he had so well merited. Seneca, however, knew him too well to place any confidence in his declarations, and kept himself out of sight as much as possible. Notwithstanding his prudence, it is said that the tyrant engaged one of his freedmen to poison him, and that Seneca by good fortune escaped the snare. It was not long, however, before an occasion was given to the emperor to gratify his hatred against one, whom he felt as a secret censor of his vices. Under the pretence of Seneca's connection with a conspiracy, a military tribune was sent with a band of soldiers to Seneca's house, where he was at supper with his wife Paulina, and two friends. He was, without much ceremony commanded to put an end to himself. The philosopher heard the sentence with equanimity, and only asked for time sufficient to make his will. This was refused, and turning to his friends, he said, that since he was not allowed to show his gratitude to them in any other way, he would leave them the image of his life, as the best memorial of their friendship. He then exhorted them to moderate their grief. He embraced Paulina, and endeavoured to comfort her; but she refused any other consolation than that of dying with him. The death which he chose was that by opening his veins, and he expired in the year 65, and in the 12th year of Nero's reign. The emperor would not suffer Paulina to die with her husband; but she never recovered the loss of blood which she had experienced, before the imperial decree arrived. The character of Seneca has been greatly extolled by some writers; and not less deprecated by others, but Tacitus, without pretending to conceal his faults, inclines to a favourable opinion of him, and it is completely ascertained that while Nero followed the precepts of his master, he appeared a good prince, and that all virtue was banished from the court, when Seneca left it. If a writer could be estimated by his works, a purer moralist could not easily be found; for their constant tenor is [illegible] solid virtue, tempered with humanity, and exalted by the noblest principles of theism. They are indeed marked with the tumid pride inculcated by the Stoical sect, to which he chiefly adhered, though he freely adopted what he found good in others. Of his writings which have come down to us, the greater part are moral, consisting of epistles, 124 in number, and of distinct treatises on Anger, Consolation, Providence, &c. There are, moreover, seven books on physical topics, entitled "Natural Questions," in which are to be found the rudiments of some notions regarded as fundamental in modern physics. A number of tragedies are extant, under the name of Seneca, but they are probably not his; nor is it at all known to whom they ought to be ascribed. The best editions of Seneca are that of Lipsius, fol. Antv. 1652, that cum notis variorum, 3 vols. 8vo. Amst. 1672, and that of Rubkopf, 5 vols. 8vo. Lips. 1797-1811. The best editions of the tragedies separately, are, that of Gronovius, 8vo. Lugd. Bat. 1661, and that of Baden, 2 vols. 8vo. Lips. 1821.

SENONES, an uncivilized nation of Gallia Transalpina, who left their native possessions on the Sequana or Seine about seventy miles from Paris, and under the conduct of Brennus, invaded Italy, and pillaged Rome. They afterwards united with the Umbri, Latins, and Etrurians, to make war against the Romans, till they were totally destroyed by Dolabella. The chief of their towns in that part of Italy where they settled near Umbria, and which from them was called Senagallica, were Fanum Fortunæ, Sena, Pisaurum, and Arimimum. [Vid. Cimbri.] Lucan. 1, 254.—Sil. 8, 454.—Liv. 5, 35, &c.

SEPIAS, a cape of Thessaly, now St George.

SEPTEM AQUÆ, a portion of the lake near Reate. Cic. Att. 4, 15.——Fratres, a mountain of Mauritania, now Gebel-Mousa. Strab. 17.——Maria, the entrances of the seven mouths of the Po.

SEPTERION, a festival observed once in nine years at Delphi, in honour of Apollo. It was a representation of the pursuit of Python by Apollo and of the victory obtained by the god.

SEPTIMIUS, TIT. a Roman knight, distinguished by his poetical compositions both lyric and tragic. He was intimate with Augustus as well as Horace, who has addressed the sixth of his second book of Odes to him.

SEQUANA, a river of Gaul, which separates the territories of the Belgæ and the Celtæ, and is now called la Seine. The course of this river extends 250 miles. Mela, 3, 2.—Lucan 1, 425.

SEQUANI, a people of Gaul, near the territories of the Ædui, between the Soane and mount Jura, famous for their wars against Rome, &c. [Vid. Ædui.] The country which they inhabit is now called Franche Compte, or Upper Burgundy. Cæs. B. G.

SERAPIO, a surname given to one of the Scipios, because he resembled a swine-herd of that name.——A Greek poet who flourished in the age of Trajan. He was intimate with Plutarch.

SERAPIS, one of the Egyptian deities, supposed to be the same as Osiris. He had a magnificent temple at Memphis, another, very rich, at Alexandria, and a third at Canopus. The worship of Serapis was introduced at Rome, by the emperor Antoninus Pius, A. D. 146, and the mysteries celebrated on the 6th of May, but with so much licentiousness that the senate were soon after obliged to abolish them. Herodotus, who speaks in a very circumstantial manner of the deities, and of the religion of the Egyptians, makes no mention of the god Serapis. Apollodorus says it is the same as the bull Apis. Paus. 1, 18. 2, 34.—Tacit. Hist. 4, 83. Martial. 9, 50.

SERBONIS, now Sibakat-Bardowal, a lake between Egypt and Palestine, and near mount Casius. Here Typhon, the murderer of Osiris, was said to be concealed.

SERES, a nation of Asia. Vid. Serica.

SERGESTUS, a sailor in the fleet of Æneas, from whom the family of the Sergii at Rome were descended. Virg Æn. 5, 121.

SERGIUS, one of the names of Catiline.——A military tribune at the siege of Veii. The family of the Sergii was patrician, and branched out into the several families of the Fidenates, Silt. Catilinæ, Nattæ, Oecilæ, and Planci.

SERICA or the Land of Silk, a country of Asia, touching to the west upon Scythia extra Imaum, and corresponding with the modern Chinese province of Shensee, together with parts of such other provinces as border immediately upon it. To the south it joined the territory of the Sinæ, between whom and the Seres, from their being the same people, the ancients were unable to draw any line of separation; indeed one of their authors plainly asserts that the silk came from Thina. The name Seres was altogether unknown in the country to which the ancients applied it, and was used by them as a collective appellation for many tribes, derived from the production which they furnished: the Greeks called the insect from which silk was procured Ser, the thickly woven stuff itself Holosericum, and the country which produced it Serica. The Indians were familiar with the productions of Serica many years before the Greeks and Romans; it was not till the time of Augustus that the latter people became acquainted with them. The most important of its productions, silk, was then for the first time brought into the western countries, and was purchased with the greatest avidity, especially after a Greek woman of Cos discovered a method of unravelling the stuff and weaving it in a more thin and elegant manner. The Indians at last successfully introduced the culture of silk into their own country as Serinda or Serhind, after which it became a common article of clothing amongst the western nations. The ancients were for a long time ignorant of the way in which silk was produced; the Indians told them it was a fine coating which covered the leaves of certain trees, and which the Seres moistened, combed off, and farther prepared: this method of procuring it is mentioned by Virgil, the first author who alludes to the Sericum. Others were of opinion that the Seres had a method of interweaving the beautiful flowers of their prolific meadows; but they at last became fully acquainted with the nature and properties of the silk worm, or bombyx as it was called by the Latins, of which a very tolerable description is given by Pliny. The fact of the Romans having despatched an embassy to the Chinese, seems to be very fairly established by the historians of the latter people, who state it to have been sent from An-toun (i. e. Antoninus) emperor of the west, to Oan ti, who reigned in China about A. D. 150. Plol. 6, 16.—Horat. Od 1, 29, 9.—Lucan. 10, 142.—Virg. G. 2, 121.

SERIPHUS, an island of the Ægean, south of Cythnus, and now Serpho. It was celebrated in mythology as the scene of some of the most remarkable adventures of Perseus, who changed Polydectes, king of the island, and his subjects, into stones, to avenge the wrongs offered to his mother Danae. Strabo seems to account for this fable from the rocky nature of the island. Pliny makes its circuit twelve miles. In Juvenal's time state prisoners were sent there. Pind. Pyth 12, 19.—Strab. 10.—Juv Sat 10, 170.

SERRANUS, a surname given to Cincinnatus, because he was found sowing his fields when told that he had been elected dictator. Some, however, suppose that Serranus was a different person from Cincinnatus. Plin. 18, 3.—Liv. 3, 26.—Virg. Æn 6 844.——One of the auxiliaries of Turnus, killed in the night by Nisus. Virg. Æn. 9, 333.——A poet of some merit in Domitian's reign. Juv. 7, 80.

SERTORIUS, QUINTUS, a Roman general, son of Quintus and Rhea, born at Nursia. His first campaign was under the great Marius, against the Teutones and Cimbri. He visited the enemy's camp as a spy, and had the misfortune to lose one eye in the first battle he fought. When Marius and Cinna entered Rome and slaughtered all their enemies, Sertorius accompanied them, but he expressed his sorrow and concern at the melancholy death of so many of his countrymen. He afterwards fled for safety into Spain, when Sylla had proscribed him, and in this distant province he behaved himself with so much address and valour that he was looked upon as the sovereign of the country. The Lusitanians universally revered and loved him, and the Roman general did not show himself less attentive to their interest, by establishing public schools, and educating the children of the country in the polite arts, and the literature of Greece and Rome. He had established a senate, over which he presided with consular authority, and the Romans, who followed his standard, paid equal reverence to his person. They were experimentally convinced of his valour and magnanimity as a general, and the artful manner in which he imposed upon the credulity of his adherents in the garb of religion, did not diminish his reputation. He pretended to hold commerce with heaven by means of a white hind which he had tamed with great success, and which followed him every where, even in the field of battle. The success of Sertorius in Spain, and his popularity among the natives alarmed the Romans. They sent some troops to oppose him, but with little success. Four armies were found insufficient to crush or even hurt Sertorius, and Pompey and Metellus, who never engaged an enemy without obtaining the victory were driven with dishonour from the field. But the favourite of the Lusitanians was exposed to the dangers which usually attend greatness. Perpenna, one of his officers who was jealous of his fame, and tired of a superior, conspired against him. At a banquet the conspirators began to open their intentions by speaking with freedom and licentiousness in the presence of Sertorius, whose age and character had hitherto claimed deference from others. Perpenna overturned a glass of wine, as a signal to the rest of the conspirators, and immediately Antonius, one of his officers, stabbed Sertorius, and the example was followed by all the rest; seventy-three years before Christ. Sertorius has been commended for his love of justice and moderation. The flattering description which he heard of the Fortunate Islands when he past into the west of Africa, almost tempted him to bid adieu to the world, and perhaps he would have retired from the noise of war, and the clamours of envy, to end his days in the bosom of a peaceful and solitary island, had not the stronger calls of ambition and the love of fame prevailed over the intruding reflections of a moment. It has been observed, that in his latter days Sertorius became indolent, and fond of luxury and wanton cruelty; yet we must confess that in affability, clemency, complaisance, generosity, and military valour, he not only surpassed his contemporaries, but the rest of the Romans. Plut. in Vita.—Paterc. 2, 30, &c.—Flor. 3, 21, &c.—Appian. de Civ.

SERVILIA, a sister of Cato of Utica, greatly enamoured of Julius Cæsar, though her brother was one of the most inveterate enemies of her lover. To convince Cæsar of her affection, she sent him a letter filled with the most tender expressions of regard for his person. The letter was delivered to Cæsar in the senate-house, while they were debating about punishing the associates of Catiline's conspiracy, and when Cato saw it, he exclaimed that it was a letter from the conspirators, and insisted immediately on its being made public. Upon this Cæsar gave it to Cato, and the stern senator had no sooner read its contents, than he threw it back with the words of "take it drunkard." From the intimacy which existed between Servilia and Cæsar, some have supposed that the dictator was the father of M. Brutus. Plut. in Cæs. — C. Nep. in Attico.—Another sister of Cato, who married Silanus.——A daughter of Thrasea, put to death by order of Nero, with her father. Her crime was the consulting of magicians only to know what would happen in her family.

SERVILIA LEX, de pecuniis repetundis, by C. Servilius, the prætor, A. U. C. 653. It punished severely such as were guilty of peculation and extortion in the provinces. Its particulars are not precisely known.——Another, de judicibus, by Q. Servilius Cæpio, the consul, A. U. C. 647. It divided the right of judging between the senators and the equites, a privilege which, though originally belonging to the senators, had been taken from them and given to the equites.——Another, de civitate, by C. Servilius, ordained that if a Latin accused a Roman senator, so that he was condemned, the accuser should be honoured with the name and the privileges of a Roman citizen.—— Another, agraria, by P. Servilius Rullus, the tribune, A. U. C. 690. It required the immediate sale of certain houses and lands which belonged to the people, for the purchase of others in a different part of Italy. It required that ten commissioners should be appointed to see it carried into execution, but Cicero prevented its passing into a law by the three orations which he pronounced against it.

SERVILIUS PUBLIUS, a consul who supported the cause of the people against the nobles, and obtained a triumph in spite of the opposition of the senate, after defeating the Volsci. He afterwards changed his opinions, and very violently opposed the people, because they had illiberally treated him.——Ahala, a master of horse to the dictator Cincinnatus. When Mælius refused to appear before the dictator to answer the accusations which were brought against him on suspicion of his aspiring to tyranny, Ahala slew him in the midst of the people whose protection he claimed. Ahala was accused for this murder and banished, but his sentence was afterwards repealed. He was raised to the dictatorship.——A prætor ordered by the senate to forbid Sylla to approach Rome. He was ridiculed and insulted by the conqueror's soldiers.——Publius, a proconsul of Asia during the age of Mithridates. He conquered Isauricus, for which service he was surnamed Isauricus, and rewarded with a triumph.——Nonianus, a Latin historian, who wrote a history of Rome, in the reign of Nero. There were more than one writer of this name, as Pliny speaks of a Servilius remarkable for his eloquence and learning; and Quintilian mentions another equally illustrious for his genius and literary merit.——Casca, one of Cæsar's murderers.——The family of the Servili was of patrician rank, and came to settle at Rome after the destruction of Alba, where they were promoted to the highest offices of the state. To the several branches of this family were attached the different surnames of Ahala, Axilla, Priscus, Capio, Structus, Geminus, Pulex, Vatia, Casca, Fidenas, Longus, and Tucca.

SERVIUS, TULLIUS, the sixth king of Rome, was son of Ocrisia a slave of Corniculum, by Tullius, a man slain in the defence of his country against the Romans. Ocrisia was given by Tarquin to Tanaquil his wife, and she brought up her son in the king's family, and added the name of Servius to that which he had inherited from his father, to denote his slavery. Young Servius was educated in the palace of the monarch with great care, and though originally a slave, he raised himself so much to consequence, that Tarquin gave him his daughter in marriage. His own private merit and virtues recommended him to notice not less than the royal favours, and Servius, become the favourite of the people and the darling of the soldiers, by his liberality and complaisance, was easily raised to the throne on the death of his father-in-law. Rome had no reason to repent of her choice. Servius endeared himself still more as a warrior and as a legislator. He defeated the Velientes and the Tuscans, and by a proper act of policy he established the census, which told him that Rome contained about 84,000 inhabitants. He increased the number of the tribes, he beautified and adorned the city, and enlarged its boundaries by taking within its walls the hills Quirinalis, Viminalis, and Esquilinus. He also divided the Roman people into tribes, and that he might not seem to neglect the worship of the gods, he built several temples to the goddess of fortune, to whom he deemed himself particularly indebted for obtaining the kingdom. He also built a temple to Diana on mount Aventine, and raised himself a palace on the hill Esquilinus. Servius married his two daughters to the grandsons of his father-in law, the elder to Tarquin, and the younger to Arunx. This union, as might be supposed, tended to ensure the peace of his family; but if such were his expectations, he was unhappily deceived. The wife of Arunx, naturally fierce and impetuous, murdered her own husband to unite herself to Tarquin, who had likewise assassinated his wife. These bloody measures were no sooner pursued than Servius was murdered by his own son-in-law, and his daughter Tullia showed herself so inimical to filial gratitude and piety, that she ordered her chariot to be driven over the mangled body of her father, B. C. 534. His death was universally lamented, and the slaves annually celebrated a festival in his honour, in the temple of Diana, on mount Aventine, the day that he was murdered. Tarquinia, his wife, buried his remains privately, and died the following day. Liv. 1, 41.—Dionys H. 4.—Flor 1, 6. Cic. de Div. 1, 53.—Val. Max. 1, 6.—Ovid. Fast. 6 601.——Sulpitius Rufus, an eminent Roman jurist and statesman, descended from an illustrious family. He was contemporary with Cicero, and probably born about a century B. C. He cultivated polite literature from a very early period, especially philosophy and poetry. At an early age he appeared as a pleader at the bar. In consequence of a reproof received from Quintus Mucius, an eminent lawyer, grounded upon his ignorance of the law, he applied himself with great industry to legal studies, and became one of the most eminent lawyers of Rome. Cicero highly commends his legal knowledge. Sulpitius passed through the various civil offices of the Roman state, and was consul B.C 51. Cæsar made him governor of Achaia after the battle of Pharsalia, but when that chief was taken off, Sulpitius returned to Rome, and acted with the republican party. He died in the camp of Antony, under the walls of Modena, having been sent on an embassy to that leader from the Roman senate. Cicero, in his 9th Philippic, pleads for a brazen statue to be erected to Sulpitius, which honour was granted by the senate. ——Claudius, a grammarian. Suet de Cl. Gr. ——Honoratus Maurus, a grammarian and critic, who flourished in the reigns of Arcadius and Honorius. He is principally known by his commentaries on Virgil, which contain some valuable notices of the geography and arts of antiquity. The commentaries of Servius are given most correctly in the edition of Virgil by Burmann, 4 vols. 4to, Amst. 1746. A tract on prosody by this author, entitled "Centimetrum," is printed in the collections of the ancient grammarians.

SESOSTRIS, a celebrated king of Egypt some ages before the Trojan war. His father ordered all the children in his dominions who were born on the same day with him to be publicly educated, and to pass their youth in the company of his son. This succeeded in the highest degree, and Sesostris had the pleasure to find himself surrounded by a number of faithful ministers, and active warriors, whose education and intimacy with their prince rendered them inseparably devoted to his interest. When Sesostris had succeeded on his father's throne he became ambitious of military fame, and after he had divided his kingdom into thirty-six different districts, he marched at the head of a numerous army to make the conquest of the world. Libya, Æthiopia, Arabia, with all the islands of the Red Sea, were conquered, and the victorious monarch marched through Asia, and penetrated farther into the east than the conqueror of Darius. He also invaded Europe, and subdued the Thracians; and that the fame of his conquests might long survive him, he placed columns in the several provinces he had subdued; and many ages after, this pompous inscription was read in many parts of Asia, "Sesostris the king of kings has conquered this teritory by his arms." At his return home the monarch employed his time in encouraging the fine arts, and in improving the revenues of his kingdom. He erected 100 temples to the gods for the victories which he had obtained, and mounds of earth were heaped up in several parts of Egypt, where cities were built for the reception of the inhabitants during the inundations of the Nile. Some canals were also dug near Memphis to facilitate navigation, and the communication of one province with another. In his old age, Sesostris, grown infirm and blind, destroyed himself, after a reign of forty-four years, according to some. His mildness towards the conquered has been admired, while some have upbraided him for his cruelty and insolence in causing his chariot to be drawn by some of the monarchs whom he had conquered. The age of Sesostris is so remote from every authentic record, that many have supported that the actions and conquests ascribed to this monarch are uncertain and totally fabulous. Herod 2, 102, &c. —Diod. 1. —Val Flacc. 5, 419. —Plin. 33, 3. —Lucan 10, 276.—Strab. 16.

SESTOS, a city of Thrace, on the shores of the Hellespont, nearly opposite to Abydos, which lay somewhat to the south. It appears to have been founded at an early period by some Ætolians. Sestos was the place where Xerxes built his famous bridge of boats, and where Leander was drowned, after swimming from Abydos to visit his mistress, Hero, the priestess of Venus here. The site of Sestos is now called Jalowa. Mela, 2, 2.—Strab. 13.—Virg. 3, 253.—Ovid. Heroid, 18, 2.

SETABIS. Vid. Sestabis

SETHON, a priest of Vulcan, who made himself king of Egypt after the death of Anysis. He was attacked by the Assyrians and delivered from this powerful enemy by an immense number of rats, which in one night gnawed their bow-strings and thongs, so that on the morrow their arms were found to be useless. From this wonderful circumstance Sethon had a statue which represented him with a rat in his hand, with the inscription of, "Whoever fixes his eyes upon me, let him be pious." Herod. 2, 141.

SETIA, now Sezza, a town of Latium, north-east of Antium and north of Circeii. Its wine was in considerable repute, and Augustus gave it the preference, as being of all kinds the least calculated to injure the stomach. Plin. 14, 6.—Juv. Sat. 10, 27.—Martial. 13, 112.

SEVERA, Julia Aquilia, a Roman lady, whom the emperor Heliogabalus married She was soon after repudiated, though possessed of all the charms of mind and body which could captivate the most virtuous ——Valeria, the wife of Valentinian, and the mother of Gratian, was well known for her avarice and ambition. The emperor her husband, repudiated her and afterwards took her again. Her prudent advice at last ensured her son Gratian on the imperial throne. ——The wife of Philip, the Roman emperor.

SEVERUS, Lucius Septimius, a Roman emperor born at Leptis in Africa, of a noble family. He gradually exercised all the offices of the state, and recommended himself to the notice of the world by an ambitious mind, and a restless activity, that could, for the gratification of avarice, endure the most complicated hardships. After the murder of Pertinax, Severus resolved to remove Didius Julianus who had bought the imperial purple when exposed to sale by the licentiousness of the prætorians, and therefore he proclaimed himself emperor on the borders of Illyricum, where he was stationed against the barbarians. To support himself in this bold measure, he took as his partner in the empire Albinus, who was at the head of the Roman forces in Britain, and immediately marched towards Rome, to crush Didius and all his partizans. He was received as he advanced through the country with universal acclamations, and Julianus himself was soon deserted by his favourites, and assassinated by his own soldiers. The reception of Severus at Rome was sufficient to gratify his pride; the streets were strewed with flowers, and the submissive senate were ever ready to grant whatever honours or titles the conqueror claimed. In professing that he had assumed the purple only to revenge the death of the virtuous Pertinax, Severus gained many adherents, and was enabled not only to disarm, but to banish the prætorians, whose insolence and avarice were become alarming not only to the citizens, but to the emperor. But while he was victorious at Rome, Severus did not forget that there was another competitor for the imperial purple. Pescennius Niger was in the east at the head of a powerful army, and with the name and ensigns of Augustus. Many obstinate battles were fought between the troops and officers of the imperial rivals, till on the plains of Issus which had been above five centuries before covered with the blood of the Persian soldiers of Darius, Niger was totally ruined by the loss of 20,000 men. The head of Niger was cut off and sent to the conqueror, who punished in a most cruel manner all the partisans of his unfortunate rival. Severus afterwards pillaged Byzantium, which had shut her gates against him; and after he had conquered several nations in the east, he returned to Rome, resolved to destroy Albinus, with whom he had hitherto reluctantly shared the imperial power. He attempted to assassinate him by his emissaries; but when this had failed of success, Severus had recourse to arms, and the fate of the empire was again decided on the plains of Gaul. Albinus was defeated, and the conqueror was so elated with the recollection that he had now no longer a competitor for the purple, that he insulted the dead body of his rival, and ordered it to be thrown into the Rhone, after he had suffered it to putrify before the door of his tent, and to be torn to pieces by his dogs. The family and the adherents of Albinus, shared his fate; and the return of Severus to the capital exhibited the bloody triumphs of Marius and Sylla. The richest of the citizens were sacrificed, and their money became the property of the emperor. The wicked Commodus received divine honours, and his murderers were punished in the most wanton manner. Tired of the inactive life which he led in Rome, Severus marched into the east, with his two sons Caracalla and Geta, and with uncommon success made himself master of Seleucia, Babylon, and Ctesiphon, and advanced without opposition far into the Parthian territories. From Parthia the emperor marched towards the more southern provinces of Asia; after he had visited the tomb of Pompey the Great, he entered Alexandria; and after he had granted a senate to that celebrated city, he viewed with the most criticising and inquisitive curiosity the several monuments and ruins which that ancient kingdom contains. The revolt of Britain recalled him from the east. After he had reduced it under his power, he built a wall across the northern part of the island to defend it against the frequent invasions of the Caledonians. Hitherto successful against his enemies, Severus now found the peace of his family disturbed. Caracalla attempted to murder his father as he was concluding a treaty of peace with the Britons; and the emperor was so shocked at the undutifulness of his son, that on his return home he called him into his presence, and after he had upbraided him for his ingratitude and perfidy, he offered him a drawn sword adding, "If you are so ambitious of reigning alone, now imbrue your hands in the blood of your father, and let not the eyes of the world be witnesses of your want of filial tenderness." If these words checked Caracalla, yet he did not show himself concerned, and Severus, worn out with infirmities which the gout and the uneasiness of his mind encreased, soon after died, exclaiming that he had been every thing man could wish, but that he was then nothing. Some say that he wished to poison himself, but that when this was denied, he eat to great excess, and soon after expired at York on the 4th of February, in the 211th year of the Christian era, in the 66th year of his age, after a reign of seventeen years eight months and three days. Severus has been so much admired for his military talents, that some have called him the most warlike of the Roman emperors. As a monarch he was cruel, and it has been observed that he never did an act of humanity, or forgave a fault. In his diet he was temperate, and he always showed himself an open enemy to pomp and splendour. He loved the appellation of a man of letters, and he even composed a history of his own reign, which some have praised for its correctness and veracity. However cruel Severus may appear in his punishments and in his revenge, many have endeavoured to exculpate him, and observed that there was need of severity in an empire whose morals were so corrupted, and where no less than 3000 persons were accused of adultery during the space of seventeen years. Of him, as of Augustus, some were fond to say, that it would have been better for the world if he had never been born, or had never died. Dio — Herodian. — Victor 6c — — Alexander, (Marcus Aurelius,) a native of Phœnicia, adopted by Heliogabalus. His father's name was Genesius Marcianus, and his mother's Julia Mammea, and he received the surname of Alexander, because he was born in a temple sacred to Alexander the Great. He was carefully educated, and his mother, by paying particular attention to his morals, and the character of his preceptors, preserved him from those infirmities, and that licentiousness, which old age too often attributes to the depravity of youth. At the death of Heliogabalus, who had been jealous of his virtues, Alexander, though only in the 14th year of his age, was proclaimed emperor, and his nomination was approved by the universal shouts of the army, and the congratulations of the senate. He had not long been on the throne before the peace of the empire was disturbed by the incursions of the Persians Alexander marched into the east without delay, and soon obtained a decisive victory over the barbarians. At his return to Rome he was honoured with a triumph, but the revolt of the Germans soon after called him away from the indolence of the capital. His expedition into Germany was attended with some success, but the virtues and the amiable qualities of Alexander were forgotten in the stern and sullen strictness of the disciplinarian. His soldiers, fond of repose, murmured against his severity; their clamours were fomented by the artifice of Maximinus, and Alexander was murdered in his tent, in the midst of his camp, after a reign of thirteen years and nine days, on the 18th of March, A. D. 235. His mother Mammea shared his fate, with all his friends; but this was no sooner known than the soldiers punished with immediate death all such as had been concerned in the murder, except Maximinus. Alexander has been admired for his many virtues, and every historian, except Herodian, is bold to assert, that if he had lived, the Roman empire might soon have been freed from those tumults and abuses which continually disturbed her peace, and kept the lives of her emperors and senators in perpetual alarms. His severity in punishing offences was great, and such as had robbed the public, were they even the most intimate friends of the emperor, were indiscriminately sacrificed to the tranquillity of the state, which they had violated. The great offices of the state, which had before his reign been exposed to sale, and occupied by favourites, were now bestowed upon merit, and Alexander could boast that all his officers were men of trust and abilities He was a patron of literature, and he dedicated the hours of relaxation to the study of the best Greek and Latin historians, orators, and poets; and in the public schools, which his liberality and the desire of encouraging learning had founded, he often heard with pleasure and satisfaction the eloquent speeches and declamations of his subjects. The provinces were well supplied with provisions, and Rome was embellished with many stately buildings and magnificent porticos. Alexand. vit.—Herodian.—Zonar. — Victor —— Flavius Valerius, a native of Illyricum, nominated Cæsar by Galerius. He was put to death by Maximianus, A. D 307. ——Libius, a man proclaimed emperor of the west, at Ravenna, after the death of Majorianus. He was soon after poisoned. —— Cassius, an orator banished into the island of Crete by Augustus, for his illiberal language. He was banished seventeen years, and died in Seriphos. He is commended as an able orator, yet declaiming with more warmth than prudence. His writings were destroyed by order of the senate. Suet. in Oct.—Quint ——Sulpitius, an ecclesiastical historian, who died A. D. 420. The best of his works is his Historia Sacra, from the creation of the world to the consulship of Stilicho, of which the style is elegant, and superior to that of the age in which he lived. The best edition is in 2 vols. 4to. Patavii, 1741.——A celebrated architect employed in building Nero's golden palace at Rome, after the burning of that city.

SEUTHES, a Thracian king, who encouraged his countrymen to revolt, &c. This name is common to several of the Thracian princes.

SEVO, a ridge of mountains between Norway and Sweden. It assumes various names in different parts of its course as, the Langfield mountains, the Dufrafield mountains, &c. Plin. 4, 15.

SEXTIA LICINIA LEX, de magistratibus, by C Licinius and L. Sextius the tribunes A U.C. 386. It ordained that one of the consuls should be elected from among the plebeians.—Another, de religione, by the same, A. U. C. 385. It enacted that a decemvirate should be chosen from the patricians and plebeians instead of the decemviri sacris faciundis.

SEXTIÆ AQUÆ, now Aix, a town of Gallia Narbonensis, and the metropolis of Narbonensis Secunda. It owed its foundation to Sextius Calvus, who in the first expedition of the Romans into Gaul, reduced the Salyes, in whose territory it was situate. It was noted for its warm mineral springs; but they had lost their warmth and much of their efficacy in the time of Augustus. Marius defeated the Cimbri and Teutones near this place. Liv. Epit. 61.—Strab. 4.—Plut. in Mar Flor. 3, 3.

SEXTILIUS, a governor of Africa, who ordered Marius when he landed there to depart immediately from his province Marius heard this with some concern, and said to the messenger, "Go and tell your master that you have seen the exiled Marius sitting on the ruins of Carthage." Plut. in Mar.

SEXTIUS LUCIUS, was remarkable for his friendship with Brutus. He gained the confidence of Augustus, and was consul, A C. 730. Horace, who was in the number of his friends, dedicated od 1, 4, to him.——One of the sons of Tarquin. Vid. Tarquinius.

SEXTUS, a son of Pompey the Great. [Vid. Pompeius.]——A stoic philosopher, born at Chæronæa in Bœotia. Some suppose that he was Plutarch's nephew. He was preceptor to M. Aurelius, and L. Verus.

SIBYLLÆ, certain women said to have been inspired by heaven with the knowledge of futurity. They flourished in different parts of the world, but their number is unknown. Plato speaks of one, others of two, Pliny of three, Ælian of four, and Varro of ten, an opinion which is universally adopted by the learned. These ten Sibyls generally resided in the following places, Persia, Libya, Delphi, Cumæ in Italy, Erythræa, Samos, Cumæ in Æolia, Marpessa on the Hellespont, Ancyra in Phrygia, and Tibur. The most celebrated of the Sibyls is that of Cumæ in Italy, whom some have called by the different names of Amalthæa, Demophile, Herophile, Daphne, Manto, Phemonoe, and Deiphobe. It is said that Apollo became enamoured of her, and that, to make her sensible of his passion, he offered to give her whatever she should ask. The Sibyl demanded to live as many years as she had grains of sand in her hand, but unfortunately forgot to ask for the enjoyment of the health, vigour and bloom, of which she was then in possession The god granted her her request, but she refused to gratify the passion of her lover, though he offered her perpetual youth and beauty. Some time after she became old and decrepid, her form decayed, and melancholy paleness and haggard looks succeeded to bloom and cheerfulness. She had already lived about 700 years when Æneas came to Italy, and, as some have imagined, she had three centuries more to live before her years were as numerous as the grains of sand which she had in her hand She gave Æneas instructions how to find his father in the infernal regions, and even conducted him to the entrance of hell. It was usual for the Sibyl to write her prophecies on leaves which she placed at the entrance of her cave, and it required particular care in such as consulted her to take up those leaves before they were dispersed by the wind, as their meaning then became incomprehensible. According to the most authentic historians of the Roman republic, one of the Sibyls came to the palace of Tarquin the Second, with nine volumes which she offered to sell for a very high price. The monarch disregarded her, and she immediately disappeared, and soon after returned, when she had burned three of the volumes. She asked the same price for the remaining six books; and when Tarquin refused to buy them, she burned three more, and still persisted in demanding the same sum of money for the three that were left. This extraordinary behaviour astonished Tarquin; he bought the books and the Sibyl instantly vanished, and never after appeared to the world. These books were preserved with great care by the monarch, and called the Sibylline verses. A college of priests was appointed to have the care of them; (Id.

Duumvir,) and such reverence did the Romans entertain for these prophetic books, that they were consulted with the greatest solemnity, and only when the state seemed to be in danger. When the capitol was burnt in the troubles of Sylla, the Sibylline verses, which were deposited there, perished in the conflagration, and to repair the loss which the republic seemed to have sustained, commissioners were immediately sent to different parts of Greece, to collect whatever verses could be found of the inspired writings of the Sibyls. What the ancients tell us respecting these prophetesses is all very obscure, fabulous, and full of contradictions. It appears that the name Sibylla is properly a appellative term, and denotes "an inspired person;" and the etymology of the word is commonly sought in the Æolic or Doric σιὸς (Deus) and βολη (consilium) As regards the final fate of the Sibylline verses some uncertainty prevails. It would seem, however, according to the best authorities, that the Emperor Honorius issued an order, A. D. 399, for destroying them; in pursuance of which Stilicho burned all these prophetic writings, and demolished the temple of Apollo in which they had been deposited. Nevertheless there are still preserved, in eight books of Greek verse, a collection of oracles pretended to be Sibylline. Plat in Phæd. —Ælian V. H 12, 35. Paus. 10, 12, &c. Dod. 4 — *Ovid. SICAMBRI, or SYGAMBRI, a powerful German tribe, whose original seats were around the Rhine, the Sieg, and the Lippe They were dangerous foes to the Romans, who finally conquered them under the leading of Drusus Tiberius transferred a large part of this people to the left or southern bank of the Rhine, where they were surnamed Gugerni, and sometimes Ubii. Flor. 4, 12. — *Cæs. SICANIA, an ancient name of Sicily. Vid. Sicilia.

SICCA, Venerea, a city of Numidia, on the banks of the river Bagradas, and at some distance from the coast. It received the appellation of Venerea from a temple of Venus which it contained, and where, in accordance with a well known oriental custom, the young maidens of the place were accustomed to prostitute their persons, and thus obtain a dowry for marriage. Sall in Jug. 56.—Val Max. 2, 6.

SICELIS, (SICELIDES, plur.) an epithet applied to the inhabitants of Sicily. The Muses are called Sicelides by Virgil, because Theocritus was a native of Sicily whom the Latin poet, as a writer of Bucolic poetry, professed to imitate. Virg. Ecl 4.

SICHÆUS, called also Sicharbas and Acherbas, was a priest of the temple of Hercules in Phœnicia. His father's name was Plisthenes. He married Elisa, the daughter of Belus, and sister of king Pygmalion, better known by the name of Dido. He was so extremely rich, that his brother in-law murdered him to obtain his possessions. This murder Pygmalion concealed from his sister Dido; and he amused her by telling her, that her husband had gone upon an affair of importance, and that he would soon return. This would have perhaps succeeded had not the shades of Sichæus appeared to Dido, and related to her the cruelty of Pygmalion, and advised her to fly from Tyre, after she had previously secured some treasures, which, as he mentioned, were concealed in an obscure and unknown place. According to Justin, Acerbas was the uncle of Dido. Jug. Æn. 1, 347, &c. —Paterc. 1, 6.—Justin. 18, 4.

SICILIA, the largest, most fruitful, and populous island of the Mediterranean, lying to the south of Italy, from which it is separated by the Fretum Siculum, the strait of Messina which in the narrowest part is only two miles wide. Its short distance from the mainland of Italy gave rise to an hypothesis, among the ancients writers, that it once formed part of that country, and was separated from it by a powerful flood. The Cyclopes and Læstrygones were said to have been the first inhabitants of the island. It was formerly called Sicania, from the Sicani, who passed into it from Italy, and afterwards Sicilia from the Siculi, who also crossed over from the mainland, and drove the Sicani to the western extremity of the island; the latter people, however, are said by some to have retreated from the desolating eruptions of Ætna farther into the interior. The Elymi once dwelled in the westernmost part of the island; the Sicani, and some wandering bands of Trojans and Achæans are supposed to have been included under this name. Sicily was likewise called, at a very early period, Trinacria and Triquetra, owing to its triangular shape, and Provincia Suburbana by the Romans, from its vicinity to Italy: owing to its great fertility, it has been styled the granary of the Romans It received at various times Phœnician and Greek colonies; the Carthaginians afterwards held it in subjection, but they in their turn were dispossessed of it by the Romans. *Cic. SICINIUS DENTATUS L. a tribune of Rome, celebrated for his valour and the honours he obtained in the field of battle, during the period of forty years, in which he was engaged in the Roman armies. He was present in 121 battles; he obtained fourteen civic crowns; three mural crowns; eight crowns of gold; eighty-three golden collars; 160 bracelets; eighteen lances; twenty three horses with all their ornaments, and all as the reward of his uncommon services. He could show the scars of forty-five wounds, which he had received all in his breast, particularly in opposing the Sabines when they took the capitol. The popularity of Sicinius became odious to Appius Claudius, who wished to make himself absolute at Rome, and therefore to remove him from the capital, he sent him to the army by which, soon after his arrival, he was attacked and murdered. Of 100 men who were ordered to fall upon him, Sicinius killed fifteen, and wounded thirty, and according to Dionysius, the surviving number had recourse to artifice to overpower him, by killing him with a shower of stones and darts thrown at a distance about 90 years before the Christian era. For his uncommon courage Sicinius has been called the Roman Achilles. Val. Max 3, 2. - Dionys. 8.—Volutius, one of the first tribunes in Rome. He

SICORUS, a river of Spain, now the Segre, rising in the Pyrenees, and running into the Iberus, after flowing by the city of Ilerda. It divided the territories of the Ilergitæ from those of the Lacetani. Some writers regard it as the Sicanus of Thucydides. Cæs. B. C 1, 40.—Plin 3, 3.

SICULI, an ancient nation of Latium, who migrated to Sicily, which took this name from them, and settled in the eastern parts of the island. Vid. Sicilia

SICULUM FRETUM, now the Strait of Mesrina, the sea which separates Sicily from Italy, fifteen miles long but in some places so narrow, that the barking of dogs can be heard from shore to shore. Opposite Messina, the distance across is only three miles. This strait is supposed to have been formed by an earthquake, which separated the island from the continent.

SICYON, a city of Greece in the territory of Sicyonia, north-west of Corinth. This was one of the most ancient cities of Greece, having existed under the names of Ægialea and Mecone, long before the arrival of Pelops in the peninsula, it was famous for its olives. It was at first governed by its own kings, but afterwards formed a part of the kingdom of Mycenæ, with the whole of Achaia; it was conquered by the Dorians and Heraclidæ, and became for a time subject to Argos. It, however, regained its independence, and under the guidance of its able general Aratus, who was a native of Sicyon, possessed very considerable power. The inhabitants are characterised by some as luxurious and dissolute, and hence the proverb "Sicyonii calcei," used in reference to effeminate gaiety. Notwithstanding this, it produced many celebrated men, particularly painters and statuaries, who were by no means inferior to those of Corinth; amongst the latter was the celebrated Lysippus. The ruins of Sicyon are still to be seen near the small village of Basilico. Strab. 8.—Paus 2, 6—Hom. Il 2, 573.—Ovid.ex Pont. 4, 15, 10.—Virg. G. 2, 519.—*Hut. Vit. SICYONIA, the territory of Sicyon, on the Sinus Corinthiacus, west of Corinthia, and separated from it by the small river Nemea. Vid Sicyon.

SIDE, a city of Pamphylia, west of the river Melas, and lying on the Chelidonian bay. It was founded by the Cumæans of Æolia. It was the scene of a severe naval action between the fleet of Antiochus, commanded by Hannibal, and that of the Rhodians, in which the former was defeated. Its site is now called Eski Adalia. Strab. 14.—Liv. 37, 23 et 24.

SIDICINUM, or Teanum Sidicinum, a town of the Sidicini, in Campania. [Vid Teanum.] The territory of the Sidicini was situate to the east of that of the Aurunci.

SIDON, or Zidon, the most ancient and important city of Phœnicia, about twenty-five miles north of Tyrus, on the sea coast. It is supposed to have taken its name from Sidon, the eldest son of Canaan. It rose to a high pitch of power and splendour through the ingenuity and industry of its inhabitants, who rendered themselves very famous by their manufactures of glass and fine linen, and working of metals, as well as by their purple dye; so much so, that Homer, when describing a beautiful work of art, often speaks of it as the production of Sidonian artists. It was destroyed by the Persian king Ochus, B. C. 351, but was afterwards rebuilt by the inhabitants. Its modern name is Saide Lucan. 3, 217. 10, 141.—Diod 16.—Justin. 11, 10.—Plin. 36, 26.—Homer. Od. 15, 411. Mela. 1, 12.

SIDONIORUM INSULÆ, islands in the Persian gulf, supposed to be the same with the Sidodona of Arrian.

SIDONIS, the country of which Sidon was the capital, situate at the west of Syria, on the coast of the Mediterranean. Ovid. Met. 2, fab. 19.—Dido, as a native of the country, is often called Sidonis. Ovid. Met. 14, 80.

SIDONIUS APOLLINARIS an ecclesiastic of the fifth century, was born at Lugdunum (Lyons) He married the daughter of Avitus, who was raised to the imperial dignity on the death of Maximus, but was afterwards deposed by Majorianus. Sidonius also was made prisoner, and carried to Rome, where he obtained favour by his poem in honour of the victor. After this, he was made a patrician, and governor of the city; but in 472 he became bishop of Augustunometum (Clermont), where he died in 487. His letters were printed at Paris in 1614.

SIGA, a city in the western part of Numidia, or what was afterwards called Mauritania Cæsariensis. It was the capital of the Massæsylii, and the royal residence of Syphax before he conquered the Massylii, and removed his court to Cirta, after which it lost nearly all its consequence, till it fell into the hands of the Romans, who raised it to the dignity of a colony. It stood at the mouth of a cognominal river, on the shore of the Sinus Laturus or Gulf of Tremezen, and is now calle l Takumbreet.

SIGÆUM, or SIGEUM, now cape Yeni-cher, a promontory of Troas, near the mouth of the Scamander. It was adorned with a temple and monument of Achilles, who was buried there, and was the place where the Greeks, in their war against the Trojans, drew up their ships, and where the greater part of the battles between them was fought. *Virg. It was founded posterior to the siege of Troy by an Æolian colony, headed by Archæanax of Mitylene. He is said to have employed the stones of ancient Ilium in the construction of his town. Strab. 13.—Herod. 5, 65 et 95.

SIGNIA, now Segni, a city of Latium, south-west of Anagnia. The Carthaginian hostages were at their request transferred from Norba to Signia, as affording a more comfortable residence. Signia is noticed by several writers as producing a wine of an astringent nature. It was also noted for a particular mode of flooring with bricks, which was called the "opus Signinum." Liv. 32, 2.—Strab. 5.—Plin. 14, 6. 15 12.—Martial. 13, 116.

SILA SILVA, a forest of vast extent in the country of the Brutii, to the south of Consentia. It consisted chiefly of fir, and was celebrated for the quantity of pitch which it yielded. Plin. 15, 7.—Strab. 6.—Virg. Æn. 12, 715.

SILANUS, Decimus, a son of T. Manlius Torquatus, accused of extortion in the management of the province of Macedonia. The father himself desired to hear the complaints laid against his son, and, after he had spent two days in examining the charges of the Macedonians, he pronounced on the third day his son guilty of extortion, and unworthy to be called a citizen of Rome. He also banished him from his presence, and so struck was the son at the severity of his father, that he hanged himself on the following night. Liv 54.—Cic. de Fin. Vol. Max. 5, 5. — C. Junius, a consul under Tiberius, accused of extortion, and banished to the island of Cythera. Tacit. — Marcus, a lieutenant of Cæsar's armies in Gaul.— The father-in-law of Caligula. Suet. Cal. 22.—A proprætor in Spain, who routed the Carthaginian forces there, while Annibal was in Italy.— Turpilius, an officer of Metellus, in the Jugurthine war. Having been left by that commander at the head of the Roman garrison in Vacca, and having, through want of care, allowed the town to be retaken by the inhabitants, he was tried, and condemned to death. Plutarch, however, makes the accusation to have been a false one, and Turpilius to have been condemned through the regency of Marius. Sall. Bell. Jug. 68, 69.—Plut. Vit. Mar. — Torquatus, a man put to death by Nero — Lucius, a man betrothed to Octavia, the daughter of Claudius. Nero took Octavia away from him, and on the day of her nuptials, Silanus killed himself.

SILĀRUS, a river of Lucania, in Italy, dividing that province from Campania. It takes its rise in that part of the Apennines which belonged to the Hirpini, and, after receiving the Tanager, now Negro, and the Calor, now Calore, it empties itself into the gulf of Salerno. Its waters were said to possess the property of incrusting with a calcareous deposition wood or twigs thrown into them. Its modern name is the Sele. Strab. 5.—Plin. 2, 106.—Sil. Ital 8, 562.—*Virg. G*3, 146 — A river of Cisalpine Gaul, to the east of Bononia, running into the Padusa, or Spinetic branch of the Padus. It is now the Sularo.

SILĒNUS, a demigod, who became the nurse, the preceptor, and attendant of the god Bacchus. He was, as some suppose, son of Pan, or, according to others, of Mercury, or of Terra. Malea in Lesbos was the place of his birth. After death he received divine honours, and had a temple in Elis. Silenus is generally represented as a fat and jolly old man, riding on an ass, crowned with flowers, and always intoxicated. He was once found by some peasants in Phrygia, after he had lost his way, and could not follow Bacchus, and he was carried to king Midas, who received him with great attention. He detained him for ten days, and afterwards restored him to Bacchus, for which he was rewarded with the power of turning into gold whatever he touched. Some authors assert, that Silenus was a philosopher, who accompanied Bacchus in his Indian expedition, and assisted him by the soundness of his counsels. From this circumstance, therefore, he is often introduced speaking with all the gravity of a philosopher concerning the formation of the world, and the nature of things. The Fauns in general, and the satyrs are often called Sileni. Paus. 3, 25. 6, 24.—Philost. 23.—Ovid. Met. 4.—Hygin. fab. 191.—Diod. 3. &c.—Cic. Tusc. 1, 48. Ælian. V. H. 3, 18.—*Virg. SILIUS ITALICUS, C. a Latin poet, born about the fifteenth year of the Christian era. The place of his birth is not known; and though it has been conjectured, from his name, that he was a native of Italica in Spain, his not being claimed, as a fellow-countryman, by Martial, who has bestowed lavish praises on him, renders the supposition improbable. It is certain that he lived chiefly in Italy, in which he possessed several estates. Our knowledge of him is chiefly derived from a letter of Pliny the younger to Caninius Rufus, announcing his death. From this we learn, that he incurred some reproach in the reign of Nero, as having been forward in accusations, and that he was consul at the time of that tyrant's death; that he made a discreet and humane use of the friendship of Vitellius; and that, having acquired much honour from his conduct in the proconsulship of Asia, he thenceforth withdrew from public offices, and maintained the rank of the principal persons of the city, without power, and without envy. He passed his time chiefly in literary conversation, and in composing verses, which he sometimes recited in public. He had great taste for elegance, and purchased a number of villas, which, after enjoying for a time, he deserted for new ones. He collected a number of books, statues, and busts, to some of the latter of which he paid a kind of religious veneration. This was especially the case with respect to that of Virgil, whose birth-day he kept with more ceremony than his own, and whose tomb was included in one of his villas, as Martial informs us, and from the same authority we learn, that he was possessed of a villa which had been Cicero's. In his latter years he retired altogether to his seat in Campania, which he did not quit upon any account; and the general tide of his prosperity did not cease to flow, except in the instance of the death of the younger of his two sons, which was in some degree compensated by the consular dignity of the elder. In his seventy-fifth year he was attacked with an incurable ulcer, and he is said to have put an end to his life, by abstaining from food. The work of Silius, which has come down to the present time, is an epic poem on the second Punic war. In this he scarcely deviates from Livy, in the narration of transactions; but occasionally introduces a machinery, copied from Virgil, of whose style and manner he is an imitator. Pliny says, that "he writes with more diligence than genius." The best edition of this work is that of Ruperti, 2 vols. 8vo. Gott. 1795. Other editions of value are, that of Drakenborch, 4to Ultraj. 1717; that of Cellarius, 8vo. Lips. 1695; and that of Villebrune, 4 vols. 12mo. Paris, 1781.

SILVĀNUS, a rural deity, son of an Italian shepherd by a goat. From this circumstance he is generally represented as half a man and half a goat. According to Virgil, he was son of Picus, or, as others report, of Mars, or, according to Plutarch, of Valeria Tusculanaria, a young woman who introduced herself into her father's bed, and became pregnant by him. The worship of Silvanus was established only in Italy, where, as some authors have imagined, he reigned in the age of Kvander. This deity was sometimes represented holding a cypress in his hand, because he became enamoured of a beautiful youth called Cyparissus, who was changed into a tree of the same name. Silvanus presided over gardens and limits, and he is often confounded with the Fauns, Satyrs, and Silenus. Plut. in Parall.—Virg. Ecl. 10 G. 1, 20. 1. 2, 493.—Ælian. Anim. 6, 42.—Ovid. Met. 10.—Horat. ep 2.

SILURES, a people of Britain, dwelling in the Welsh counties of Radnor, Brecknock, Glamorgan, and Monmouth, in the English county of Hereford, and in such parts of Worcestershire and Gloucestershire as are west of the Severn. Their capital was Isca Silurum, now Caerleon, on the river Isca, or Uske, in Monmouthshire. Caractacus was a prince of the Silures. Tacit. Ann. 12, 32.—Plin. 4, 16

SIMBRIVĬUS, or SIMBRUVĬUS, a lake of Latium, formed by the Anio. Tacit Ann. 14, 22.

SIMĔTHUS, or SYMÆTHUS, a river of Sicily, rising in the Hersean mountains, and falling into the sea below Catana. It receives a number of small tributaries, and is now the Giaretta. Thucyd. 2, 65. Plin. 3, 8.

SIMMIAS, a native of Rhodes, who flourished between the 120th and 170th Olympiad. The period when he existed cannot be ascertained with more precision Three pieces of his composition remain, "The Wings," "The Egg," and "The Axe," thus denominated from the arrangement of the verses so as to form the respective figures. These elaborate trifles may be found in various editions of the Poetæ Græci Minores.——A Theban philosopher, a disciple of Socrates. He was the author of twenty-three dialogues, which are lost.

SIMOĪS, (entis,) a river of Troas which rises in mount Ida, and falls into the Xanthus It is celebrated by Homer, and most of the ancient poets, as in its neighbourhood were fought many battles during the Trojan war. Homer. Il 6, 4 12, 22 —Virg. Æn. 1, 104 3, 302, &c. Ovid. Met. 13, 324.—Mela, 1, 18.

SIMOISIUS, a Trojan prince, son of Anthemion, killed by Ajax. Homer. Il. 4, 473.

SIMON, a disciple of Socrates, whose occupation was that of a leather-dresser at Athens, and whose shop was resorted to by Socrates and his friends. He is said to have been the first who published the Socratic dialogues; but none are extant. Simon so much valued freedom of inquiry, that when Pericles invited him to make his house his residence, with the promise of an ample recompence, he refused, alleging, that he would not sell the liberty of speaking his mind at any price. Diog. Laert. 2, 122.

SIMONIDES, a celebrated poet of Ceos, son of Leoprepes, born about B. C. 556. His fame was not confined to the narrow precincts of Ceos, but extended, long before his death, through Greece and Sicily. The estimation in which his genius was held by the polite and learned of those ages may be inferred from the terms of familiarity with which he lived at Athens with the tyrant Hipparchus; the honours with which he was welcomed to Sparta by Pausanias, the Lacedæmonian general, and finally, the attentions which he received at the elegant court of Hiero. The Sicilian monarch particularly valued his compositions for their pathos, elegance, and sweetness; and he is said to have preferred the effusions of his muse to the sublimer strains of Pindar or the moral dignity of Bacchylides. Simonides, according to Cicero and Quintilian, added the two long vowels η, ω, and the two double consonants ξ, ψ, to the Greek alphabet; and is said to have first introduced the artificial improvement of memory: he is also reported by Horace to have been the inventor of elegiac writing. He carried off the prize for poetry when he was eighty years of age, but this was not the only instance which is recorded by the ancient writers of his good fortune; for Phædrus, in one of his fables, informs us, that he was so great a favourite with the gods, that the life of the poet was miraculously preserved at an entertainment when the roof of the house fell down upon all those who were present at the banquet. The life of Simonides was protracted to the advanced period of ninety years; he died in the capital of his royal friend and patron; and the inhabitants of Syracuse who had highly honoured and esteemed him when living erected a magnificent monument to his memory. According to some writers the lyric and elegiac poet of Ceos left behind him a grandson, whose name also was Simonides; it is likewise said that he was the author of some books of inventions and genealogies, and flourished a few years before the breaking out of the Peloponnesian war. The poetical writings of Simonides, composed in the Doric dialect, consisted of lyrics, elegies, epigrams, and dramatical pieces, and we are told that he composed an epic poem on Cambyses, king of Persia, but Pindar more than once insinuates that his muse was prostituted for the love of gain. Of his writings only a few fragments and epigrams remain, which are published in the collections of Stephens, Winterton, Brunck, Gaisford, and Boissonade.

SIMPLICIUS, a philosopher of the sixth century, was born in Cilicia. He was the disciple of Ammonius, the peripatetic, and settled at Athens, where he laboured to effect a union of the different sects without success. Simplicius wrote commentaries on the works of Aristotle; and also a valuable one upon Epictetus, of which last, dean Stanhope published a translation in 1704.

SINÆ, or Thinæ, a people of India, bounded on the west by India extra Gangem, on the north by Serica, and on the south by the Ocean: all the country to the eastward of them was Terra Incognita to the ancients, who therefore reckoned them the most eastern people in the world. They were undoubtedly the same with the Chinese of the present day, and it is from the principle which these people have always observed, of excluding foreigners from their dominions, or of throwing such obstacles in their way as only a few have ever surmounted, that the ancients knew so little about them

SINDÆ islands in the Indian Ocean, supposed to be the Nicobar Islands

SINDI a people of Asiatic Sarmatia below the Cimmerian Bosphorus, and opposite the Tauric Chersonesus.

SINGARA, a city of Mesopotamia, on the banks of the river Mygdonius. It was conquered by Trajan and subsequently made a Roman colony, and a strong military post, but it fell at last into the hands of the Persians It is now Sinjar Plin 5, 23. Amm. Marc 18, 5.

SINGUS, a town of Macedonia, in the peninsula of Sithonia, on the lower shore of and giving name to the Sinus Singiticus. The modern name of the gulf is that of Monte Santo. Herod. 7, 122.—Thucyd. 5, 18.

SINON, a son of Sisyphus, who accompanied the Greeks to the Trojan war, and there distinguished himself by his cunning and fraud, and his intimacy with Ulysses. When the Greeks had fabricated the famous wooden horse, Sinon went to Troy with his hands bound behind his back, and by the most solemn protestations, assured Priam, that the Greeks were gone from Asia, and that they had been ordered to sacrifice one of their soldiers, to render the wind favourable to their return, and that because the lot had fallen upon him, at the instigation of Ulysses, he had fled away from their camp, not to be cruelly immolated These false assertions were immediately credited by the Trojans, and Sinon advised Priam to bring into his city the wooden horse which the Greeks had left behind them, and to consecrate it to Minerva. His advice was followed, and Sinon, in the night, to complete his perfidy, opened the side of the horse, from which issued a number of armed Greeks, who surprised the Trojans, and pillaged their city. Dares Phryg - *Homer. SINOPE, a daughter of the Asopus by Methone. She was beloved by Apollo, who carried her away to the borders of the Euxine sea, in Asia Minor, where she gave birth to a son called Syrus.——A city of Paphlagonia, on the eastern coast, and a little below its northern extremity. It was a place of great antiquity, since its origin was referred by some to the Argonauts, by others to the Amazons. Its name was fabled to have been derived from the nymph Sinope, daughter of the Asopus. It was colonized by the Milesians, and became, in process of time, more important and famous than any other city on the shores of the Euxine. It was taken by Pharnaces, king of Pontus, after which it became the capital of that kingdom, until retaken by Lucullus during the Mithridatic war. It was the birth-place of Diogenes the Cynic. It is still called Sinub. Apoll Rhod. 2, 947.— Val. Flacc. 5, 110.— Polyb. 4, 56. - Strab. 12. - Xen. Anab. 5 et 6 —— An ancient Greek city of Campania Vid. Sinuessa.

SINTI, a Thracian community, who appear to have occupied a district on the banks of the Strymon north of the Sirop*æ*ones. Strabo affirms that they once occupied the island of Lemnos, thus identifying them with the Sintles of Homer. Hom. Il. 1, 594. Od. 8, 294.— Strab. Epit. 7.

SINUESSA, a city of Campania, subsequently of New Latium, on the sea coast, south east of Minturnæ and the mouth of the Liris. It was said to have been built on the ruins of Sinope, an ancient Greek city. It stood on the shore of the Sinus Vescinus, and derived its name from that circumstance, or, in other words, from the promontory of the coast. It was colonized together with Minturnæ, A. U C. 456, and ranked also among the maritime cities of Italy. Its territory suffered considerable devastation from Hannibal's troops when opposed to Fabius. It answers to the rock of Monte Dragone. Liv. 10, 21. 27, 38 — Plin. 3, 5.— Mel. 2, 4 — Ovid. Met. 15 715.— Strab. 5

SION, one of the hills on which Jerusalem was built. Vid. Hierosolyma.

SIPHNUS, now Siphanto, an island in the Ægean sea, one of the Cyclades, south-east of Seriphus, and north-east of Melos. It was colonized by the Ionians. It was famous for its mines of gold and silver, of which a tenth part was for a time offered to Apollo at Delphi, but this being subsequently withheld, the whole of the mines were destroyed by an inundation. The inhabitants were proverbially licentious. Herod 3, 57, &c. 8, 48.— Paus. 10, 11.— Strab. 10.

SIPONTUM, a city of Apulia, in the district of Daunia, and to the south-west of the promontory of Garganum. It was called Sipus by the Greeks, and is said to have derived its name from the cuttle-fish (Sepia) there thrown on shore. It was colonized by the Romans, and had a large, though inconvenient port, now called Pantano Salso. Strab. 6 — Liv. 8, 24. 34, 45. 39, 22 — Sil. Ital. 8, 631.

SIPYLUM, a city of Lydia, built on the site of an older city named Tantalis. It was the capital of Mæonia, and was destroyed by an earthquake, a lake or pool called Sale thenceforward occupying its place. Plin. 2, 91, 5, 29.

SIPYLUS, a mountain range of Lydia, branching off from Tmolus, and stretching, in a south-western direction from Sardis, as far as the river Hermus. Hom Il. 24, 615.

SIRENES, sea-nymphs who charmed so much with their melodious voices, that all forgot their employments to listen with more attention, and at last were seized and devoured by them. They were daughters of the Achelous, by the Muse Calliope, or, according to others, by Melpomene or Terpsichore. They were three in number, called Parthenope, Ligeia, and Leucosia, or, according to others, Molpe, Aglaophonos, and Thelxiope, or Thelxiope, and they usually lived in a small island near cape Pelorus in Sicily. Some authors suppose that they were monsters, who had the form of a woman above the waist, and the rest of the body like that of a bird, or rather, that the whole body was covered with feathers, and had the shape of a bird, except the head, which was that of a beautiful female. This monstrous form they had received from Ceres, who wished to punish them, because they had not assisted her daughter when carried away by Pluto. But, according to Ovid, they were so disconsolate at the rape of Proserpine, that they prayed the gods to give them wings that they might seek her in the sea as well as by land. The Sirens were informed by the oracle, that as soon as any persons passed by them without suffering themselves to be charmed by their songs, they should perish; and their melody had prevailed in calling the attention of all passengers, till Ulysses, informed of the power of their voice by Circe, stopped the ears of his companions with wax, and ordered himself to be tied to the mast of his ship, and no attention to be paid to his commands, should he wish to stay and listen to the song. This was a salutary precaution. Ulysses made signs for his companions to stop, but they were disregarded, and the fatal coast was passed with safety. Upon this artifice of Ulysses, the Sirens were so disappointed, that they threw themselves into the sea, and perished Some authors say, that the Sirens challenged the Muses to a trial of skill in singing, and that the latter proved victorious, and plucked the feathers from the wings of their adversaries, with which they made themselves crowns. The place where the Sirens destroyed themselves was afterwards called Sirenis, on the coast of Sicily. Virgil, however, Æn. 5, 864, places the Sirenum Scopuli on the coast of Italy, near the island of Caprea. Few fables of antiquity have given rise to so much speculation as that of the Sirens. Isidorus and many others regard them as females of meretricious characters, who allured to them those that sailed by the coast where they dwelt, and, having reduced them to poverty, were fabled to have destroyed them. Other and more recent expounders of mythology deduce the fable from three dangerous rocks in the vicinity of the spot where they are said to have lived. Paus. 10, 6. —*Homer. SIRIS, a city of Lucania, on the Sinus Tarentinus, at the mouth of a river of the same name, now the Sinno. It was founded by some Trojans, whom an Ionian colony afterwards expelled, changing the name of the town to Policum. It suffered much in a subsequent war with Metapontum and Sybaris, and became, at last the harbour of Heraclea. Strab. 6 —Dod. Sic. 14, 36.

SISAMNES, a judge flayed alive for his partiality, by order of Cambyses. His skin was nailed on the bench of the other judges, to incite them to act with candour and impartiality. Herod. 5, 25.

SISAPO, a town of Hispania, in the northern part of Bætica, supposed to answer to Almaden, on the south-western limits of La Mancha. It was famous for its vermilion.

SISENNA, L., a Roman historian, the friend of Pomponius Atticus. He wrote a history, from the taking of Rome by the Gauls down to the wars of Sylla, of which some fragments are quoted in different authors. He was considered superior to all the Roman historians that had preceded him, and hence Varro entitled his own treatise on history, Sisenna. This same writer commented on Plautus.

SISIGAMBIS, or SISYGAMBIS, the mother of Darius, the last king of Persia. She was taken prisoner by Alexander the Great, at the battle of Issus, with the rest of the royal family. The conqueror treated her with uncommon tenderness and attention; he saluted her as his own mother, and what he had sternly denied to the petitions of his favourites and ministers, he often granted to the intercession of Sisygambis. The regard of the queen for Alexander was uncommon, and indeed, she no sooner heard that he was dead, than she killed herself, unwilling to survive the loss of so generous an enemy; though she had seen, with less concern, the fall of her son's kingdom, the ruin of his subjects, and himself murdered by his servants. She had also lost in one day, her husband and eighty of her brothers, whom Ochus had assassinated to make himself master of the kingdom of Persia. Curt. 4, 9. 10, 5.

SISYPHUS, a brother of Athamas and Salmoneus, son of Æolus and Enarete, the most crafty prince of the heroic ages. He married Merope, the daughter of Atlas, or, according to others, of Pandareus, by whom he had several children. He built Ephyre, called afterwards Corinth, and he detained there Tyro, the daughter of Salmoneus, because he had been told by an oracle that his children by his brother's daughter would avenge the injuries which he had suffered from the malevolence of Salmoneus. Tyro, however, as Hyginus says, destroyed the two sons whom she had had by her uncle. It is reported that Sisyphus, mistrusting Autolycus, who stole the neighbouring flocks, marked his bulls under the feet, and when they had been carried away by the dishonesty of his friend, he confounded and astonished the thief by selecting from his numerous flocks those bulls, which by the mark he knew to be his own. The artifice of Sisyphus was so pleasing to Autolycus, who had now found one more cunning than himself, that he permitted him to enjoy the company of his daughter Anticlea, whom a few days after he gave in marriage to Laertes of Ithaca. After his death, Sisyphus was condemned in hell, to roll to the top of a hill a large stone, which had no sooner reached the summit than it fell back into the plain with impetuosity, and rendered his punishment eternal. The causes of this rigorous sentence are variously reported. Some attribute it to his continual depredations in the neighbouring country, and his cruelty in laying heaps of stones on those whom he had plundered, and suffering them to expire in the most agonizing torments. Others, to the insult offered to Pluto, in chaining Death in his palace, and detaining her till Mars, at the request of the king of hell, went to deliver her from confinement. Others suppose that Jupiter inflicted this punishment upon him because he told Asopus where his daughter Ægina had been carried away by her ravisher. The more followed opinion, however, is that Sisyphus, on his death-bed, entreated his wife to leave his body unburied, and when he came into Pluto's kingdom, he received the permission of returning upon earth to punish this seeming negligence of his wife, but, however, on promise of immediately returning. But he was no sooner out of the infernal regions, than he violated his engagements, and when he was at last brought back to hell by Mars, Pluto, to punish his want of fidelity and honour, condemned him to roll a huge stone to the top of a mountain. The institution of the Pythian games is attributed by some to Sisyphus. To be of the blood of Sisyphus was deemed disgraceful among the ancients. Homer. Od. 11, 592.—Virg. Æn. 6, 616.—*Ovid. SITHONIA, the central one of the three promontories which lie at the southern extremity of Chalcidice in Macedonia. As Chalcidice was originally a part of Thrace, the term Sithonia is often applied to the poets to the latter country; hence the epithet Sithonia. Herod. 7, 122.—Virg. Ecl. 10, 66.—*Horat. SMARAGDUS, a town of Egypt on the Arabian gulf, where emeralds (smaragdi) were dug. Strab. 16.

SMERDIS, a son of Cyrus, put to death by order of his brother Cambyses. As his execution was not public, and as it was only known to one of the officers of the monarch, one of the magi of Persia, who was himself called Smerdis, and who greatly resembled the deceased prince, declared himself king, at the death of Cambyses. This usurpation would not perhaps have been known, had he not taken too many precautions to conceal it. Otanes, a Persian noble of the first rank, suspecting at last that there was some imposture from the circumstance of Smerdis never quitting the citadel, and from his never inviting any of the nobility to his presence, discovered the whole affair through his daughter Phædyma. This female had been the wife of Cambyses, and with the other wives of the late king, had been retained by the usurper. At her father's request, she felt the head of Smerdis while he slept, and discovered that he had no ears. Otanes on this was fully convinced that the pretended monarch was no other than the magus Smerdis, he having been deprived of his ears by Cyrus on account of some atrocious conduct Upon this discovery the conspiracy ensued which ended with the death of Smerdis, and the elevation of Darius, son of Hystaspes, to the vacant throne. Herod. 3, 63, &c.

SMILAX, a beautiful shepherdess, who became enamoured of Crocus. She was changed into a flower, as also her lover. Ovid Met. 4, 283.

SMINTHEUS, one of the surnames of Apollo. He was worshipped under this name in the city of Chryse and Troas, where he also had a temple. The inhabitants raised him a temple, because he had destroyed a number of rats that infested the country. These rats were called sminthi in the language of Phrygia, whence the surname. There is another story similar to this related by the Greek scholiast of Homer. Il. 1, 39.

SMYRNA, now Ismir, a celebrated city of Asia Minor, on the coast of Ionia, and at the head of a bay to which it gave name. It belonged originally to the Æolians, but was treacherously taken from them by the Ionians. It was one of the many places that laid claim to the honour of being the birth-place of Homer, and as it appears, with considerable justice. It had a temple in honour of the poet, with his statue, and a square portico, called Homerium, a name which was also applied to a brass coin current amongst the inhabitants, who further showed their admiration of his writings by paying him divine honours. Smyrna was one of the richest and most powerful cities of Asia, and is not unfrequently called its metropolis. Its inhabitants were given to luxury and indolence, but were, notwithstanding, much esteemed for their valour and intrepidity when summoned to action. Its memory is consecrated in Scripture, being one of the churches mentioned in the Revelation of St John. Herod. 1, 16, &c.—Strab 12 et 14.—Paus. 7, 5.—Apoc. 1, 11. 2, 8.

SOANES, a people of Colchis, near Caucasus, in whose territories the rivers abound with golden sands, which the inhabitants gather in wool-skins, whence, perhaps, arose the fable of the golden fleece.

SOCRATES, the most celebrated philosopher of all antiquity, was a native of Athens. His father Sophroniscus was a statuary, and his mother Phenarete was a midwife. Having lost his small patrimony by the dishonesty of a relation, he pursued his father's profession, and is said to have executed statues of the, habited graces, which were thought worthy of a place in the citadel of Athens. He was called away from this meaner employment, at which, however, he never blushed, by Crito, who admired his genius, and courted his friendship. Philosophy soon became the study of Socrates, and under Archelaus and Anaxagoras he laid the foundation of that great and exemplary virtue which succeeding ages have ever loved and venerated. He appeared like the rest of his countrymen in the field of battle; he fought with boldness and intrepidity, and to his courage two of his friends and disciples, Xenophon and Alcibiades, owed the preservation of their lives. But the character of Socrates appears more conspicuous and dignified as a philosopher and moralist than as a warrior. He was fond of labour; he inured himself to suffer hardships: and he acquired that serenity of mind and firmness of countenance, which the most alarming dangers could never destroy, or the most sudden calamities alter. If he was poor, it was from choice, and not the effect of vanity, or the wish of appearing singular. He bore injuries with patience, and the insults of malice or resentment, he not only treated with contempt, but even received with a mind that expressed some concern, and felt compassion for the depravity of human nature. So singular and so venerable a character was admired by the most enlightened of the Athenians. Socrates was attended by a number of illustrious pupils, whom he instructed by his exemplary life, as well as by his doctrines. He had no particular place where to deliver his lectures, but as the good of his countrymen, and the reformation of their corrupted morals, and not the aggregation of riches, was the object of his study, he was present everywhere, and drew the attention of his auditors either in the groves of Academus, or the Lyceum, or on the banks of the Ilyssus. He spoke with freedom on every subject, religious as well as civil; and had the courage to condemn the violence of his countrymen, and to withstand the torrent of resentment, by which the Athenian generals were capitally punished for not burying the dead at the battle of Arginusæ. It was but too natural that a man of his exemplary virtue, whose life was a reproach to others, and who did not spare his ridicule of the pretenders to wisdom and knowledge, should create a number of enemies, and become the object of insult and slander." Either gained by the enemies of Socrates, or indulging his own sarcastic humour, Aristophanes wrote a piece entitled "The Clouds," in which the principal character was meant to personate this philosopher, and the imitation consisted in making him utter nothing but absurdity and profaneness. Socrates, conscious that he bore no real resemblance to such a representative, did not scruple to attend the performance and to humour the ridicule by standing up in the view of the crowded audience. This calm contempt of party malice produced such an effect on the public, that when Aristophanes attempted the next year to renew the exhibition of his comedy, it met with a reception that induced him to withdraw it. A more successful attempt to injure the philosopher was made some years after Melitus stood forth to criminate him, together with Anytus and Lycon, and the philosopher was summoned before the tribunal of five hundred. He was accused of corrupting the Athenian youth, of making innovations in the religion of the Greeks and of ridiculing the many gods which the Athenians worshipped; yet, false as this might appear, the accusers relied for the success of their cause upon the perjury of false witnesses, and the envy of the judges, whose ignorance would readily yield to misrepresentation, and be influenced and guided by eloquence and artifice In this their expectations were not frustrated, and while the judges expected submission from Socrates, and that meanness of behaviour and servility of defence which distinguished criminals, the philosopher, perhaps, accelerated his own fall by the firmness of his mind, and his uncomplying integrity. Lysias, one of the most celebrated orators of the age, composed an oration in a laboured and pathetic style, which he offered to his friend to be pronounced as his defence in the presence of his judges. Socrates read it, but after he had praised the eloquence and the animation of the whole, he rejected it, as neither manly nor expressive of fortitude, and, comparing it to Sicyonian shoes, which, though fitting, were proofs of effeminacy, he observed, that a philosopher ought to be conspicuous for magnanimity and for firmness of soul. In his apology he spoke with great animation, and confessed that while others boasted that they were acquainted with every thing, he himself knew nothing. The whole discourse was full of simplicity and noble grandeur, the energetic language of offended innocence. He modestly said, that what he possessed was applied for the service of the Athenians; it was his wish to make his fellow-citizens happy, and it was a duty which he performed by the special command of the gods, "whose authority," said he emphatically, to his judges, "I regard more than yours." Such language from a man who was accused of a capital crime, astonished and irritated the judges. Socrates was condemned In this stage of the trial, he had a right to enter his plea against the punishment which the accusers demanded, and instead of a sentence of death to propose some pecuniary amercement. But he at first peremptorily refused to make any proposal of this kind, imagining that it might be construed into an acknowledgment of guilt; and asserted that his conduct merited from the state reward rather than punishment. At length, however, he was prevailed upon by his friends to offer upon their credit a fine of thirty minæ. The judges notwithstanding remained inexorable; they proceeded with out further delay to pronounce sentence upon him; and he was condemned to be put to death by the poison of hemlock. Socrates received this sentence with perfect composure, and by a smile testified his contempt both for his accusers and his judges. The solemn celebration of the Delian festivals [Vid. Delia,] prevented his execution for thirty days, and during that time he was confined in the prison and loaded with irons. His friends, and particularly his disciples, were his constant attendants; he discoursed with them upon different subjects with all his usual cheerfulness and serenity. He reproved them for their sorrow, and when one of them was uncommonly grieved because he was to suffer though innocent, the philosopher replied, "Would you then have me die guilty?" With this composure he spent his last days, he continued to be a preceptor till the moment of his death, and instructed his pupils on questions of the greatest importance; he told them his opinions in support of the immortality of the soul, and reprobated with acrimony the prevalent custom of suicide. He disregarded the intercession of his friends, and when it was in his power to make his escape out of prison he refused it, and asked with his usual pleasantry, where he could escape death; "where," says he to Crito, who had bribed the gaoler, and made his escape certain, "where shall I fly to avoid this irrevocable doom passed on all mankind?" When the hour to drink the poison was come, the executioner presented him the cup with tears in his eyes Socrates received it with a steady hand, and after prayer to the gods for a favourable passage to the invisible world, swallowed the poisonous draught. His friends around him burst into tears. Socrates alone was unmoved. He upbraided their weakness, and implored them to exercise a manly fortitude worthy of the friends of virtue. He continued walking till the influence of the hemlock forced him to lie down upon his bed. After remaining silent for a short time, he requested Crito not to neglect the offering of a cock, which he had vowed to Æsculapius. Then covering himself with his cloak he expired. Such was the end of a man whom the uninfluenced answer of the oracle of Delphi had pronounced the wisest of mankind. He was no sooner buried than the Athenians repented of their cruelty, and turned their indignation against his accusers. Melitus was condemned to death, and Anytus escaped the same fate only by voluntary exile. To give a farther proof of the sincerity of their regret, the Athenians recalled the friends of Socrates from exile, decreed a general mourning, and erected a statue to his memory. His death happened 396 B. C., and in the 70th year of his age. As Socrates left nothing in writing, we are indebted to his illustrious pupils, Xenophon and Plato, for what is known both of his opinions and manner of teaching; and more especially to the former, whose memoirs of Socrates contain more accurate information than the dialogues of Plato, because he intermixes his own conceptions and diction with the ideas and language of his master. The philosophy of Socrates forms an interesting epoch in the history of the human mind. The son of Sophroniscus derided the more abstruse enquiries and metaphysical researches of his predecessors, and by first introducing moral philosophy, he induced mankind to consider themselves, their passions, their opinions, their duties, actions, and faculties. From this it was said that the founder of the Socratic school drew philosophy down from heaven upon the earth. In his attendance upon religious worship, Socrates was himself an example, he believed the divine origin of dreams and omens, and publicly declared that he was accompanied by a daemon or invisible conductor, [Vid. Dæmon,] whose frequent interposition stopped him from the commission of evil, and the guilt of misconduct. This familiar spirit, however, according to some, was nothing more than a sound judgment assisted by prudence and long experience, which warned him at the approach of danger, and from a general speculation of mankind could foresee what success would attend an enterprise, or what calamities would follow an ill managed administration. As a supporter of the immortality of the soul, he allowed the perfection of a supreme knowledge from which he deduced the government of the universe. From the resources of experience as well as nature and observation, he perceived the indiscriminate dispensation of good and evil to mankind by the hand of heaven, and he was convinced that none but the most inconsiderate would incur the displeasure of their Creator to avoid poverty or sickness, or gratify a sensual appetite, which must at the end harass their soul with remorse and the consciousness of guilt. From this natural view of things, he perceived the relation of one nation with another, and how much the tranquillity of civil society depended upon the proper discharge of these respective duties. The actions of men furnished materials also for his discourse, to instruct them was his aim, and to render them happy was the ultimate object of his daily lessons. From principles like these, which were enforced by the unparalleled example of an affectionate husband, a tender parent, a warlike soldier, and a patriotic citizen in Socrates, soon after the celebrated sects of the Platonists, the Peripatetics, the Academics, Cyrenaics, Stoics, &c arose. Socrates never wrote for the public eye, yet many support that the tragedies of his pupil Euripides were partly composed by him. He was naturally of a licentious disposition, and a physiognomist observed, in looking in the face of the philosopher, that his heart was the most depraved, immodest, and corrupted that ever was in the human breast. This nearly cost the satirist his life, but Socrates upbraided his disciples, who wished to punish the physiognomist, and declared that his assertions were true, but that all his vicious propensities had been duly corrected and curbed by means of reason. Socrates made a poetical version of Æsop's fables, while in prison. Laert.—Xenoph.—Plato.—Pans 1, 22. Plut. de op. Phil &c.—Cic. de Orat. 1, 54. Tusc 1, 41, *&c.—Val. SOEMIAS, JULIA, mother of the emperor Heliogabalus, was made president of a senate of women, which she had elected to decide the quarrels and the affairs of the Roman matrons. She at last provoked the people by her debaucheries, extravagance, and cruelties, and was murdered with her son and family. She was a native of Apamea, her father's name was Julius Avitus, and her mother's Mæa. Her sister Julia Mammæa married the emperor Septimius Severus.

SOGDIANA, a country of Upper Asia, between the Jaxartes and the Oxus, lying to the west of Scythia extra Imaum, from which it was separated by the range of Imaus. It was bounded on the north by the Jaxartes, and on the south by the Oxus, and corresponded with the modern province of Great Bukharia, a little district of which near the metropolis preserves the ancient name in Al Sogd. The metropolis of Sogdiana was Marsacanda, now Samarcand, situated on the banks of the Polytimetus, or Kohick; it has been rendered famous in modern times by Tamerlane having constituted it the capital of his empire.

SOGDIANUS, a son of Artaxerxes Longimanus, who murdered his elder brother, king Xerxes, to make himself master of the Persian throne. He was but seven months in possession of the crown. His brother Ochus, who reigned under the name of Darius Nothus, conspired against him, and suffocated him in a tower full of warm ashes.

SOL, (the sun), was an object of veneration among the ancients. It was particularly worshipped by the Persians, under the name of Mithras. [Vid. Hercules.] The Massagetæ sacrificed horses to the sun on account of their swiftness. According to some of the ancient poets, Sol and Apollo were two different persons. Apollo, however, and Phœbus and Sol, are universally supposed to be the same deity.

SOLINUS, C JULIUS, a Latin grammarian, but of what particular period is not known, though he is generally referred to the third century. He appears to have resided chiefly at Rome, but is known only as the author of a work, which he called Polyhistor. It is a collection of various notices, principally geographical, taken from different authors, many of whom are now lost, but particularly from Pliny, whose text may perhaps be corrected from this abridgment. The best edition of the Polyhistor is that of Salmasius, 2 vols. 8vo. Traj. 1689.

SOLIS FONS, a celebrated fountain in Libya. Vid. Ammon.

SOLI, a city of Cyprus, on the northern shore of the island, and south west of the promontory Crommyon. It was founded by two Athenian leaders named Phalerus and Acamas. It derives celebrity from the circumstance of Solon having resided there for some years at the court of Philocyprus the reigning prince. Aristocyprus, who succeeded his father Philocyprus, was one of the leaders in the revolt excited by Onesilus against the Persians, and fell in the battle fought near Amathus. Notwithstanding his death, the Solians made a vigorous defence when besieged by the enemy, and surrendered only after their walls had been undermined. Soli has the name of Solea still attached to its site. Strab. 14.—

It was the birth-place of Chrysippus the philosopher, and of two distinguished poets, Philemon and Aratus. Many writers affirmed that the term σολοικισμός, which expressed an incorrect and ungrammatical mode of speaking, was derived from Soli, the inhabitants of which used a mixed and corrupt language. This etymology, however, is not fully agreed upon. This city, having been nearly depopulated by an invasion of Tigranes, king of Armenia, received a new foundation, as it were, under Pompey the Great, who settled there a colony of the Cilician pirates, whom he had conquered. In consequence of this benefit, Soli assumed the name of Pompeiopolis The present name of Soli is Mezetlu. Strab 14 - Dio Cass. 36.—Mela, 1, 13.—Plin. 5, 27.—Tacit. Ann. 2, 58.

SOLON, one of the seven wise men of Greece, was born at Salamis, and educated at Athens. His father's name was Euphorion, or Execestides; one of the descendants of king Codrus, and by his mother's side he reckoned among his relations the celebrated Pisistratus. After he had devoted part of his time to philosophical and political studies, Solon travelled over the greatest part of Greece, but at his return home he was distressed with the dissensions which were kindled among his countrymen. All fixed their eyes upon Solon as a deliverer, and he was unanimously elected archon and sovereign legislator. He might have become absolute, but he refused the dangerous office of king of Athens, and, in the capacity of lawgiver, he began to make a reform in every department. The complaints of the poorer citizens found redress, all debts were remitted, and no one was permitted to seize the person of his debtor if unable to make a restoration of his money. After he had made the most salutary regulations in the state, and bound the Athenians by a solemn oath that they would faithfully observe his laws for the space of a hundred years, Solon resigned the office of legislator and removed himself from Athens. He visited Egypt, and in the court of Cræsus king of Lydia, he convinced the monarch of the instability of fortune, and told him, when he wished to know whether he was not the happiest of mortals, that Tellus, an Athenian, who had always seen his country in a flourishing state, who had seen his children lead a virtuous life, and who had himself fallen in defence of his country was more entitled to happiness than the possessor of riches, and the master of empires. After ten years' absence Solon returned to Athens, but he had the mortification to find the greatest part of his regulations disregarded by the factious spirit of his countrymen, and the usurpation of Pisistratus. Not to be longer a spectator of the divisions that reigned in his country, he retired to Cyprus, where he died at the court of king Philocyprus, in the eightieth year of his age, 558 years before the Christian era. The salutary consequences of the laws of Solon can be discovered in the length of time they were in force in the republic of Athens. For above 400 years they flourished in full vigour, and Cicero, who was himself a witness of their benign influence, passes the highest encomiums upon the legislator, whose superior wisdom framed such a code of regulations. It was the intention of Solon to protect the poorer citizens, and by dividing the whole body of the Athenians into four classes, three of which were permitted to discharge the most important offices and magistracies of the state, and the last to give their opinion in the assemblies, but not have a share in the distinctions and honours of their superiors, the legislator gave the populace a privilege which, though at first small and inconsiderable, soon rendered them masters of the republic, and of all the affairs of government. He made a reformation in the Areopagus, increased the authority of the members, and permitted them yearly to enquire how every citizen maintained himself, and to punish a man as lived in idleness, and were not employed in some honourable and lucrative profession. He also regulated the Prytaneum, and fixed the number of its judges to 400. The sanguinary laws of Draco were all cancelled, except that against murder, and the punishment denounced against every offender was proportioned to his crime; but Solon made no law against parricide or sacrilege. The former of these crimes, he said, was too horrible to human nature for a man to be guilty of it, and the latter could never be committed, because the history of Athens had never furnished a single instance. Such as had died in the service of their country, were buried with great pomp, and their family was maintained at the public expence; but such as had squandered away their estates, such as refused to bear arms in defence of their country, or paid no attention to the infirmities and distress of their parents, were branded with infamy. The laws of marriage were newly regulated. It became a union of affection and tenderness, and no longer a mercenary contract. To speak with ill language against the dead as well as the living, was made a crime, and the legislator wished that the character of his fellow-citizens should be freed from the aspersions of malevolence and envy. A person that had no children was permitted to dispose of his estates as he pleased, and the females were not allowed to be extravagant in their dress or expences. To be guilty of adultery was a capital crime, and the friend and associate of lewdness and debauchery was never permitted to speak in public, for, as the philosopher observed, a man who has no shame, is not capable of being entrusted with the people. These celebrated laws were engraven on several tables, and that they might be better known and more familiar to the Athenians they were written in verse. The indignation which Solon expressed on seeing the tragical representations of Thespis, is well known, and he sternly observed, that if falsehood and fiction were tolerated on the stage, they would soon find their way among the common occupations of men. According to Plutarch, Solon was reconciled to Pisistratus, but this seems to be false, as the legislator refused to live in a country where the privileges of his fellow-citizens were trampled upon by the usurpation of a tyrant. SOMNUS, son of Erebus and Nox, was one of the infernal deities, and presided over sleep. His palace, according to some mythologists, is a dark cave, where the sun never penetrates. At the entrance are a number of poppies and somniferous herbs. The god himself is represented as asleep on a bed of feathers with black curtains. The Dreams stand by him, and Morpheus is his principal minister watches to prevent the noise from awakening him. Hesod. Theog. — Homer Il. 14, 230.—Virg. Æn. 6, 893.—*Ovid. SOPHOCLES, a celebrated tragic poet, was born at Athens about B. C. 497. He received an education in every way suitable to his rank in life; and it appears that he was but a youth, when the monuments of the victory over Xerxes were fixed up at Salamis, and then he went at the head of a chorus of noble birth, whose song of triumph he led by the strains of his lyre. He first applied himself to lyric poetry, but the fame acquired by Æschylus, the author, or at least the great reformer, of Grecian tragedy, induced him to try his powers in that species of composition, and in his 28th year he ventured to contend with that veteran for the theatrical prize. He obtained the victory, which was followed by the retreat of his rival, who left him the undisputed master of the tragic stage. The improvements introduced by Sophocles were so great, that he has generally and justly been regarded as the father of the regular tragedy. He brought a third interlocutor to the two who before alone appeared on the scene at once, he lessened the chorus in the subject of the piece; reduced the turgid and unnatural diction of Æschylus to the proper standard of heroic dignity; and invented that artful construction of fable and development of incidents, which contribute so much to the interest of a dramatic performance. In these points he was superior to his younger competitor Euripides; and upon the whole, he appears to have stood at the head of his class, in the judgment both of Greek and Roman critics. Cicero terms him "a divine poet;" and in a line of Virgil the "Sophoclean buskin" is made an appellation for tragedy in general. Dionysius of Halicarnassus commends him particularly for preserving the dignity of his characters, and dwelling rather on the more noble and generous affections, than on the mean and debasing passions. These praises show that his works were regarded as the most perfect example of tragedy, in the highest sense of the word. Sophocles was a statesman, as well as a tragedian, and entrusted with very important civil and military employments. He retained his faculties to the last, and continued to write tragedies to an advanced age, and when his unnatural sons on account of some neglect in his domestic affairs, applied to the magistrates to put him under their guardianship, as having outlived his understanding, he appeared in court, an advocate in his own cause, and reciting his Œdipus at Colonos, which he had just finished, appealed to the judges and auditors, if that were the work of the dotard described by his own children. The sentence was pronounced unanimously in his favour, and he was carried home with every mark of triumph. The benignity of his character acquired him a number of friends, his attachment to whom, and his moderate wishes, caused him to decline the invitations of the kings who were desirous of drawing him to their courts. He paid every token of respect to the memory of his rival Euripides, thus demonstrating that he was incapable of the meanness of jealousy. He lived to the great age of ninety, and is said even at that age to have died with joy, on obtaining the prize for his last tragedy. Above a hundred pieces have been attributed to him by some ancient writers, of which only seven have reached our times. Of these, both separately and collectively, many editions have been made. Among the most esteemed are, that of Brunck, 2 vols. 4to. Argent. 1786, and 3 vols 8vo Argent. 1786-9, that of Erfurdt, 7 vols. 8vo. Lips. 1802-11, and the smaller edition of Erfurdt superintended by Hermann, Lips. 1823, which is not yet completed. They have been translated into English by Francklin, Potter, and Dale.

SOPHONISBA, a daughter of Asdrubal the Carthaginian, celebrated for her beauty. She married Syphax, a prince of Numidia, and when her husband was conquered by the Romans and Masinissa, she fell a captive into the hands of the enemy. Masinissa became enamoured of her, and married her. This behaviour displeased the Romans; and Scipio, who at that time had the command of the armies of the republic in Africa, rebuked the monarch severely, and desired him to part with Sophonisba. This was an arduous task for Masinissa, yet he dreaded the Romans. He entered Sophonisba's tent with tears in his eyes, and told her that as he could not deliver her from captivity and the jealousy of the Romans, he recommended her, as the strongest pledge of his love and affection for her person, to die like the daughter of Asdrubal. Sophonisba obeyed, and drank, with unusual composure and serenity, the cup of poison which Masinissa sent to her, about 203 years before Christ. Liv. 30, 12, &c.—Sallust. de Jug.—Justin. 33, 1.

SOPHRON, a native of Syracuse, born about 420, B. C. and celebrated as a writer of mimes. His pieces, composed in the Doric dialect, and not in verse properly so called, but in a species of cadenced prose, were great favourites with Plato, who became acquainted with them through Dion of Syracuse, and spread the taste for this species of composition at Athens. We have only a few fragments remaining of the mimes of Sophron which are given in the Classical Journal, vol. 4, p 380, and with additions and corrections in the Museum Criticum, No. 7, p 640

SOPHRONISCUS, the father of Socrates

SORACTE, a mountain of Etruria, a little to the south east of Falerii, now Monte S. Silvestro, or, as it is by modern corruption sometimes termed, Sont' Oreste. On the summit was a temple and grove dedicated to Apollo, to whom an annual sacrifice was offered by a people of the country, distinguished by the name of Hirpi, who were on that account held sacred, and exempted from military service and other public duties. The sacrifice consisted in their passing over heaps of red hot embers, without being injured by the fire. Plin. 7, 2.—Horat. Od. 1, 9.—Virg Æn 11, 785.—Sil. Ital 5, 175.

SOSIBIUS, a grammarian of Laconia, B. C. 255. He was a great favourite of Ptolemy Philopator, and advised him to murder his brother, and the queen his wife, called Arsinoe. He lived to a great age, and was on that account called Polychronos. He was afterwards permitted to retire from the court, and spend the rest of his days in peace and tranquillity, after he had disgraced the name of minister by the most abominable crimes, and the murder of many of the royal family. His son of the same name was preceptor to king Ptolemy Epiphanes.——The preceptor of Britannicus, the son of Claudius. Tacit. Ann 11, 1.

SOSIGENES, a mathematician and chronologer of Egypt, who was sent for to Rome by Julius Cæsar, to assist in correcting the calendar, and it was he who formed what is called the Julian year. His works are lost.

SOSII, celebrated booksellers at Rome, in the age of Horace. Ep. 1, 20, 2.

SOSIPATER, a grammarian in the reign of Honorius. He published five books of observations on grammar.——A general of Philip, king of Macedonia.

SOSIUS, a consul who followed the interest of Mark Antony.——A Roman of consular dignity, to whom Plutarch dedicated his Lives

SOSTHENES, a general of Macedonia, who flourished B. C. 181. He defeated the Gauls under Brennus, and was killed in the battle. Justin. 24, 5.——A native of Cnidos, who wrote a history of Iberia. Plut.

SOSTRATUS, a grammarian in the age of Augustus. He was Strabo's preceptor.——An architect of Cnidos, B. C 284, who built the white tower of Pharos, in the bay of Alexandria. He inscribed his name upon it [Vid. Pharos ]——A Greek historian, who wrote an account of Etruria.——A poet, who wrote a poem on the expedition of Xerxes into Greece. Jun. 10, 174

SOTADES, an Athenian poet of the middle comedy.——A Greek poet, a native of Maronea, whose name has descended to posterity covered with infamy. He was the author of Cinædologie strains, which exceeded in impurity any thing that had gone before them. These poems, at first called Ionici, were subsequently denominated Sotadica. Having, before leaving Alexandria, where he had been living for some time, written a very gross epigram on Ptolemy Philadelphus, that prince caused him to be pursued. Sotades was seized in the island of Caunus, enclosed in a case of lead, and cast into the sea. Athen. 14.

SOTER, a surname of the first Ptolemy.—— It was also common to other monarchs SOTERIA, days appointed for thanksgivings and the offering of sacrifices for deliverance from danger. One of these was observed at Sicyon, to commemorate the deliverance of that city from the hands of the Macedonians by Aratus.

SOTERICUS, a poet and historian in the age of Diocletian. He wrote a panegyric on that emperor, as also a life of Apollonius Thyaneus. His works, greatly esteemed, are now lost, except some few fragments preserved by the scholast on Lycophron.

SOTHIS, an Egyptian name of the constellation called Sirius, which received divine honours in that country.

SOZOMEN, an ecclesiastical historian of Bethulia in Palestine, who died 450 A. D. His history extends from the year 324 to 439, and is dedicated to Theodosius the younger, being written in a style of inelegance and mediocrity. The best edition is that of Reading, fol. Cantab. 1720.

SPACO the nurse of Cyrus. The word signified a female dog in the Median language. Herod 1, 110.

SPARTA, a celebrated city of Greece, the capital of Laconia. It was situated in an extensive plain, on the right bank of the Eurotas, now the Eure, which was here so full and rapid as to be seldom forded. It was at first an inconsiderable place, presenting the appearance of a collection of villages, and resembled a great camp rather than a regularly planned and built city. It continued without walls during the most flourishing periods of its history, Lycurgus having taught his countrymen, that the real defence of a town was solely in the valour of its citizens; but when it was governed by despots, fortifications were erected which rendered it capable of sustaining a regular siege Its circumference then was 48 stadia, but it contained more inhabitants than many cities occupying double that space. Before the Peloponnesian war, it was destroyed by an earthquake; only five houses having been left standing after the shocks had ceased. Its public buildings were originally few and insignificant, but their number and beauty increased with the power of the inhabitants Sparta is said to have received its name from Sparta, the daughter of Eurotas, who married Lacedæmon. It was also called Lacedæmon. [Vid. Lacedæmon. ] Its remains are about two miles distant from the modern Mistra. Thucyd. 1, 10 - *Ælian. SPARTACUS, a king of Pontus.——Another, king of Bosphorus, who died B C. 433 His son and successor of the same name died B. C. 407 —— Another, who died 284 B C.——A Thracian shepherd, celebrated for his abilities, and the victories which he obtained over the Romans. Being one of the gladiators who were kept at Capua in the house of Lentulus, he escaped from the place of his confinement with thirty of his companions, and took up arms against the Romans. He soon found himself with 10,000 men equally resolute with himself and though at first obliged to hide himself in the woods and solitary retreats of Campania, he soon laid waste the country; and when his followers were increased by additional numbers, and better disciplined, and more completely armed, he attacked the Roman generals in the field of battle. Two consuls and other officers were defeated with much loss; and Spartacus, superior in counsel and abilities, appeared more terrible, though often deserted by his fickle attendants. Crassus was sent against him, but this celebrated general at first despaired of success. A bloody battle was fought, in which, at last, the gladiators were defeated. Spartacus behaved with great valour when wounded in the leg: he fought on his knees, covering himself with his buckler in one hand, and using his sword with the other, and when at last he fell, he fell upon a heap of Romans, whom he had sacrificed to his fury. B. C. 71. In this battle no less than 10,000 of the rebels were slain, and the war totally finished. Flor. 3, 20. Liv. 95. —Europ. 6, 2.—Plut. in Crass.—Patere. 2, 30. —*Appian de B. SPARTÆ, or SPARTI, a name given to those men who sprang from the dragon's teeth which Cadmus sowed. They all destroyed one another, except five, who survived and assisted Cadmus in building Thebes. Ovid. Met. 3, 125.

SPARTANI, or SPARTIATÆ, the inhabitants of Sparta. Vid. Sparta, Lacedæmon.

SPARTIANUS, ÆLIUS, a Roman historian, flourished in the time of Diocletian, to whom he dedicated the lives of Adrian, Ælius Verus, Didius Julianus, Severus, and Pescennius Niger, which, as well as his lives of Caracalla and Geta, are come down to our times. He makes one of the Historiæ Augustæ Scriptores, but his historical merits are very inconsiderable.

SPERCHIUS, a river of Thessaly, rising in mount Tymphrestus, which is the southern part of mount Pindus, and flowing eastward through the valley formed by the ranges of Othrys and Œta, into the Sinus Maliacus, now the gulf of Zeitoun. It received its name from σπέρχειν festinare, owing to the rapidity of its current, and to it Peleus vowed the hair of his son Achilles, if he returned safe from the Trojan war. It is now the Hedadn. Herod. 7, 198. Homer Il. 23, 144.—Apollod. 3, 13.—Mela, 2, 3.—Ovid. Met. 1, 557. 2, 250. 7, 240.

SPEUSIPPUS, an Athenian philosopher, the son of Eurymedon, by the sister of Plato. He succeeded his uncle in his school, over which he presided eight years, commencing from the death of that illustrious philosopher, B. C. 348. He closely adhered to the doctrines of his master, but his manners did no honour to them, being both avaricious and a lover of pleasure. Becoming paralytic in his limbs, he was conveyed to and from the academy on a vehicle. On one of these occasions he met Diogenes, and saluted him; but the cynic, instead of returning the civility, upbraided him for enduring to live under such an infirmity. Speusippus well replied, "that he lived not in his limbs, but in his mind." At length, overcome by his maladies, and wearied of life, he put an end to his existence, having first constituted Xenocrates his successor in the academy. Diog. Laert.

SPHACTERIA, an island off the coast of Mycenæ, and at the entrance of the harbour of Pylos Messenicus, which it nearly closed. It was also known by the name of Sphagia, which it still retains. Sphacteria was famed for the capture of a Lacedæmonian detachment during the Peloponnesian war. Strab. 8.

SPHÆRUS, an arm-bearer of Pelops, son of Tantalus. He was buried in a small island near the isthmus of Corinth, which, from him, was called Spheria. Paus. 5, 10.——A Greek philosopher, disciple to Zeno of Cyprus, 243 B. C. He came to Sparta in the age of Agis and Cleomenes, and opened a school there. Plut. in Ag.

SPHINX, a monster which had the head and breasts of a woman, the body of a dog, the tail of a serpent, the wings of a bird, the paws of a lion, and a human voice. It sprang from the union of Orthus with the Chimæra, or of Typhon with Echidna. The Sphinx had been sent into the neighbourhood of Thebes by Juno, who wished to punish the family of Cadmus, which she persecuted with immortal hatred, and it laid this part of Bœotia under continual alarms by proposing enigmas, and devouring the inhabitants if unable to explain them. In the midst of their consternation the Thebans were told by the oracle, that the Sphinx would destroy herself as soon as one of the enigmas she proposed was explained. In this enigma she wished to know what animal walked on four legs in the morning, two at noon, and three in the evening. Upon this Creon, king of Thebes, promised his crown and his sister Jocasta in marriage to him who could deliver his country from the monster by a successful explanation of the enigma. It was at last happily explained by Œdipus, who observed that man walked on his hands and feet when young, or in the morning of life; at the noon of life he walked erect, and in the evening of his days he supported his infirmities with a stick. [Id. Œdipus.] The Sphinx no sooner heard this explanation than she dashed her head against a rock, and immediately expired. Some mythologists wish to unriddle the fabulous traditions about the Sphinx, by the supposition that one of the daughters of Cadmus, or Laius, infested the country of Thebes by her continual depredations, because she had been refused a part of her father's possessions. The lion's paw expressed, as they observe, her cruelty, the body of the dog her lasciviousness, her enigmas the snares she laid for strangers and travellers, and her wings the dispatch she used in her expeditions. Plut.—Hesiod. Theog 326.—Hygin. fab. 68.—Apollod. 3, 5.—Ovid. in Ib. 378.—Soph. in Œd. T.

SPHRAGIDIUM, a cave on mount Cithæron in Bœotia. The nymphs of the place were called Sphragitides. Paus 9, 3.—Plut. in Arist.

SPINA, a city of Gallia Cisalpina, near the entrance of the most southern branch of the Padus, called from it Ostium Spineticum. It was founded by the Pelasgi. It became in time so flourishing a colony, as to present to the treasury at Delphi more valuable offerings than any other city. The Pelasgi were driven from it by the Tusci, and they, in their turn, by the Gauls, who took and destroyed it. Spina was once only twenty stadia from the sea, a distance which the alluvial deposit of the Po has increased eight fold. Dion. Hal. 1, 18.—Plin. 3, 16.

SPINTHARUS, a Corinthian architect, who built Apollo's temple at Delphi. Paus 10, 5. ——A freedman of Cicero. ad Att. 13, ep. 25.

SPOLETIUM, a city of Umbria, north-east of Interamna, in the south-western section of the country. It was colonized A. U. C. 512, and is famous in history for having withstood an attack made on it by Hannibal, shortly after the battle of Trasymene. It suffered severely in the civil wars of Marius and Sylla, from proscription. Its modern name is Spoleto Vell. Paterc. 1 14 — Liv. 22, 9 Flor. 3, 21. Appian. B. Civ. 5, 33.

SPORADES, a name given by the Greeks to the numerous islands lying to the south and east of the Cyclades, with which they are not unfrequently confounded. They received their name from the word σπείρω sporeo, owing to their dispersed situation, being scattered over the Cretan, Carpathian, and Icarian seas, as well as along the coast of Caria in Asia Minor. The chief of them, belonging to Europe, were Thera, Anaphe, Ios, Sicinos, Pholegandros, Donusa, Amorgos, Astypalæa, and Carpathus. Strab 10.—Plin 4, 12.

SPURINNA, an astrologer, who told Julius Cæsar to beware of the ides of March. As he went to the senate-house on the morning of the ides, Cæsar said to Spurinna, "the ides are at last come" "Yes," replied Spurinna, "but not yet past." Cæsar was murdered a few moments after. Suet. in Cæs 81 Val Max 1 et 8

SPURIUS, a praenomen common to many of the Romans.——One of Cæsar's murderers —— Lartius, a Roman who defended the bridge over the Tiber against Porsenna's army.

STABIÆ, a town of Campania on the coast, about two miles below the river Sarnus, now Castel a Mare. It was once a place of some note, but having been destroyed by Sylla during the civil wars, its site was chiefly occupied by villas and pleasure grounds. Plin. 3, 5.—Ovid. Met. 15, 711. Sil Ital 11, 409.

STAGIRA, a city of Macedonia, on the upper shore of the peninsula of mount Athos, near its junction with the mainland, and on the coast of the Sinus Strymonicus It was a colony from Andros, and the birth-place of Aristotle thence surnamed Stagirites Some trace of the ancient name is apparent in that of Stavros. Thucyd. 4, 188. Diog Laert 5, 11 et 16.

STASEAS a peripatetic philosopher, engaged to instruct young M. Piso in philosophy Cic. in Orat. 1, 22.

STASICRATES, a statuary and architect in the wars of Alexander, who offered to make a statue of mount Athos, which was rejected by the conqueror, &c.

STATILIUS, a young Roman celebrated for his courage and constancy He was an inveterate enemy to Cæsar, and when Cato murdered himself, he attempted to follow his example, but was prevented by his friends. The conspirators against Cæsar wished him to be in their number, but the answer which he gave displeased Brutus He was at last killed by the army of the triumvirs Plut

STATIRA, a daughter of Darius, who married Alexander The conqueror had formerly refused her, but when she had fallen into his hands at Issus, the nuptials were celebrated with uncommon splendour No less than 9000 persons attended, to each of whom Alexander gave a golden cup, to be offered to the gods. Statira had no children by Alexander. She was cruelly put to death by Roxana, after the conqueror's death. Justin. 12, 12 ——A sister of Darius, the last king of Persian. She also became his wife, according to the manners of the Persians. She died after an abortion, in Alexander's camp, where she was detained as prisoner. She was buried with great pomp by the conqueror. Plut. in Alex.——A wife of Artaxerxes Mnemon, poisoned by her mother-in-law, queen Parysatis. Plut. in Art.——A sister of Mithridates the Great. Plut

STATIUS, CÆCILIUS a comic poet in the age of Ennius. He was a native of Gaul, and originally a slave. His language was inelegant, but he is said to have possessed much dramatic talent. Cic de Senect —— Annæus, a physician, the friend of the philosopher Seneca. Tacit. Ann. 15, 64.——P. Papinius, an eminent Roman poet, was born at Neapolis, in which city his father was settled and was in great reputation both for his lectures and poetry, in which he gained several prizes. Statius was born A. D. 61 He early displayed a lively disposition and good talents, and soon became a votary of the Muses, with so much success, that during his father's life he obtained the crown in the poetical contests of his native place. He was also thrice a victor in the poetical games celebrated at Alba. A piece which he recited at Rome, in the quinquennial games instituted by Nero and renewed by Domitian, procured for him a golden crown from that emperor, and admission to his table He was vanquished in a contest at the Roman games, on which occasion he recited a part of his principal poem, the Thebaid According to Juvenal, he was heard with delight by a crowd of auditors in other public recitations of his poem; the satirist at the same time intimating that, notwithstanding this applause, the author might have starved, had he not sold a new composition, his Agave, to the actor Paris, Domitian's favourite. He possessed a small estate and country house near the site of the ancient Alba, and lived in a decent state of mediocrity Having no children of his own, he adopted a son, whose death he tenderly laments in one of his miscellaneous poems. The time of his own death is not known; but it is thought to have been in the year 96, when he was only 35 years of age The existing works of Statius consist of the Sylvæ, or miscellaneous pieces, in five books, the Thebais, an epic poem, in twelve books; and two books of an unfinished poem entitled Achilleis. They all display a considerable share of real genius and talent, but are vitiated by the false taste which then began to infect Latin poetry, and gave a turn to turgid and unnatural thoughts and expressions. Several pieces in the Sylvæ are, however, pleasing and elegant His principal work, the Thebaid, holds no mean rank among epic poems, and once it was a great favourite among the remains of antiquity. For this preference it was indebted to its swelling sentiments, verging to bombast, and to the savage and sanguinary character of its incidents, which suited the times of chivalrous turbulence. But still even with these faults, it exhibits strokes of the real sublime, and considerable force and novelty in natural description, especially in the similes. The best editions of Statius are, that of Gronovius, 12mo, Amst 1653, that of Barthius, 3 vols. 4to Cygneæ, 1664, that of Markland (the Sylvæ merely) 4to. Lond. 1728, and that of Amar and Lemaire, 3 vols 8vo. Paris, 1825.

STATOR, a surname of Jupiter, given him by Romulus, because he stopped (sto) the flight of the Romans in a battle against the Sabines

The conqueror erected him a temple under that name. Liv. 1, 12

STELLIO, a youth turned into an elf by Ceres, because he derided the goddess. Ovid Met. 5, 415

STENOBŒA. Vid Sthenobœa.

STENTOR, one of the Greeks who went to the Trojan war. His voice is described as so powerful that it equalled in loudness that of fifty men together. Juno assumed his form to animate the Greeks whose power was exhausted in a fight against the Trojans. Homer. Il. 5, 784 — Juv. 14, 192.

STENTORIS LACUS, an estuary which the Hebrus forms at its mouth. Herod. 7, 58.

STEPHANUS, Byzantinus, a grammarian, flourished, as is conjectured, about the close of the 5th century. He was a professor in the imperial college at Constantinople, and composed a dictionary containing words denoting the names of places, and designating the inhabitants of those places. Of this work there exists only an abridgment, made by Hermolaus, and dedicated to the emperor Justinian. This work is known by the title, περὶ πόλεων, de Urbibus, but that of the original was Ἐθνικά, whence it has been supposed that the author's intention was to write a geographical work. The best edition of Stephanus is that of Berkelius, completed by Gronovius, fol L. Bat. 1658.

STEROPE, one of the Pleiades, daughters of Atlas. She married Œnomaus, king of Pisa, by whom she had Hippodamia, &c

STESICHORUS a Greek lyric poet, born at Himera, in Sicily, and who flourished about 570, B. C. His original name was Tisias, but he was afterwards called Stesichorus, in consequence of the improvements which he introduced in the arts of music and dancing. He was the inventor of the fable of the horse and the stag which Horace and some other poets have imitated, and this he composed to prevent his countrymen from entering into an alliance with Phalaris. He is said to have died at Catana, in Sicily, in the 85th year of his age; and to have been magnificently buried there at the public expence His compositions are said to have been written in the Doric dialect, and to have consisted of no less than twenty six books, all of which are now lost, with the exception of a few fragments. Stesichorus possessed, according to Dionysius, all the excellencies and graces of Pindar and Simonides, and surpassed them both in the grandeur of his subjects, in which he well preserved the characteristics of manners and persons; and Quintilian represents him as having displayed the sublimity of his genius by the selection of weighty topics, such as important wars and the actions of great commanders, in which he sustained with his lyre the dignity of epic poetry Accordingly Alexander the Great ranks him among those who were the proper study of princes. The best collection of the fragments of Stesichorus is given by Blomfield, in the Museum Criticum, No. 6, p. 256.

STHENELUS, a king of Mycenæ son of Perseus and Andromeda. He married Nicippe, the daughter of Pelops, by whom he had two daughters and a son called Eurystheus, who was born, by Juno's influence, two months before the natural time, that he might obtain a superiority over Hercules, as being older. Sthenelus made war against Amphitryon, who had killed Electryon and seized his kingdom. He fought with success and transmitted to Eurystheus an undisputed crown and an extended kingdom Homer. Il 19, 91. — Apollod. 2 4. — A son of Capaneus. He was one of the Epigoni, and of the suitors of Helen. He went to the Trojan war, and was one of those who were shut up in the wooden horse, according to Virgil. Pans 2, 18. — Virg. Æn. 2 & 10 — A son of Androgeus, the son of Minos. Hercules made him king of Thrace. Apollod. 2, 5. — A son of Actor, who accompanied Hercules in his expedition against the Amazons. He was killed by one of these females STHENOBŒA, a daughter of Jobates, king of Lycia, who married Proetus, king of Argos. She became enamoured of Bellerophon, who had taken refuge at her husband's court, after the murder of his brother, and when he refused to gratify her criminal passion, she accused him before Proetus of attempts upon her virtue. According to some she killed herself after his departure. Homer. Il. 6, 162. — Hygin fab. 57. — Many mythologists call her Antea.

STILICHO, a general of the emperor Theodosius the Great He behaved with much courage, but under the emperor Honorius he showed himself turbulent and disaffected. As being of a barbarian extraction, he wished to see the Roman provinces laid desolate by his countrymen, but in this he was disappointed. Honorius discovered his intrigues, and ordered him to be beheaded, about the year of Christ 408 His family were involved in his ruin. Zosimus, though upon the whole not favourable to him, acquits him of the treason laid to his charge, and he will live in the poetry of Claudian as the most distinguished hero of his age.

STILPO a celebrated philosopher of Megara, who flourished 336 years before Christ, and was greatly esteemed by Ptolemy Soter He was naturally addicted to riot and debauchery, but he reformed his manners when he opened a school at Megara. He was universally respected; his school was frequented, and Demetrius, when he plundered Megara, ordered the house of the philosopher to be left safe and unmolested. Stilpo excited prejudices by not paying respect to the Athenian superstitions, but there is no proof of his infidelity with respect to the existence of a supreme divinity. On moral topics he is said to have taught that the highest felicity consists in a mind free from the dominion of passion, a doctrine similar to that of the stoics. He is said to have lived to a great age, and to have expedited his final departure by a draught of wine.

STOBÆUS, Joannes, a Greek writer who flourished A. D. 405. He was the author of several works, none of which have come down to modern times, except the fragments of a collection of extracts from ancient poets and philosophers The best editions of Stobæus are that of Heeren, 2 vols. (in 4) 8vo. Götting. 1792, and that of Gaisford, 4 vols. 8vo. Oxon. 1822.

STOBI, a city of Macedonia, in the district of Pæonia, to the north of Edessa, and not far from the junction of the Erigonus and Axius. Liv. 33, 19 40, 21.

STŒCHADES, islands in the Mediterranean, off the coast of Gaul, and in a south-east direction from Telo Martius or Toulon, now Isles d' Hieres. Strabo and Ptolemy make them five in number, but Pliny only three. They are said to have their name from their being ranged on the same line, (στοὰ, ᾶς.) Plin. 3, 5.—Lucan. 3, 316

STOICI, a celebrated sect of philosophers founded by Zeno of Citium. They received their name from the portico, στοὰ, where the philosopher delivered his lectures. Vid Zeno.

STRABO, a Roman cognomen in the Pannian, Pompeian, and other families. It was first applied to those whose eyes were distorted but afterwards became a general name —A celebrated geographer, born at Amasia in Pontus. The time of his birth is uncertain, but it appears from his writings that he was familiar with C. Gallus when prefect of Egypt, to which office Gallus was appointed after the death of Antony and Cleopatra; and that he was composing his geography in the fourth year of the emperor Tiberius. Strabo received a very enlarged education. He was sent at an early age to Nyssa for the study of grammar and rhetoric, and afterwards was instructed in the principles of the various sects of philosophers in several of the most celebrated schools of Asia. Of the circumstances of his life we have no other information than such as can be deduced from his works. He was a great traveller, and visited a considerable proportion of the countries which he describes. His tours extended from Armenia to Sardinia, and from the Euxine sea to Æthiopia. He must have been advanced in years when he wrote his geography, but how much longer he survived is unknown. Strabo was the author of some historical works which have been lost, but his "Geography," in seventeen books, has been preserved, and is justly regarded as one of the most valuable relics of antiquity. He treats on almost all the parts of the world then known, and though the geographical science was at that period in an imperfect state, and information concerning many countries was incorrect, yet his work is very useful in elucidating the historical and other writings of the ancients. As he was a man of a cultivated mind, he has interspersed many philosophical remarks, and short narratives relative to history and antiquities, which augment the value of his performance Among the most useful editions of Strabo may be mentioned that of Casaubon, fol Paris, 1620; that of Almeloveen, 2 vols. fol Amst 1707 which is a reprint of Casaubon's, enriched with notes from various scholars; and that of Coray, 4 vols. 8vo, Paris, 1805-19

STRATO, or STRATON, a philosopher of Lampsacus, was a disciple of Theophrastus, to whose school he succeeded about B C 286. He was distinguished by his attachment to natural philosophy, which gave him the surname of Physicus The eloquence and learning which he displayed caused him to be appointed preceptor to Ptolemy Philadelphus, who remunerated his services by a donation of eighty talents Strato presided in the peripatetic school during eighteen years, and composed a number of books, none of which have reached our time. His constitution was feeble, and it is said that he lost the powers of perception before his death. The opinions of Strato nearly approached to that atheism which excludes the idea of deity in the formation of the world From Cicero we learn, that he conceived all divine power to be vested in nature, which possesses the causes of production, increase, and diminution, but is wholly destitute of sensation and figure. He taught, also, that the seat of the soul is in the middle of the brain, and that it only acts by means of the senses. Diog. 5 —Cic. Acad. 1, 9. 4, 38 ——A physician of Berytus, a pupil of Erasistratus, and like him, a determined enemy to bleeding. He became the head of a school. —A licentious poet, a native of Sardis. Two hundred and twenty epigrams of his are preserved in the Greek Anthology.

STRATON. Vid. Strato.

STRATONICE a daughter of Thespius. Apollod — A daughter of Pleuron. Id — A daughter of Ariarathes, king of Cappadocia, who married Eumenes, king of Pergamus, and became mother of Attalus. —A daughter of Demetrius Poliorcetes, who married Seleucus, king of Syria. Antiochus, her husband's son by a former wife, became enamoured of her, and married her with his father's consent, when the physicians had told him that if he did not comply, his son's health would be impaired. Plut. in Dem —Val Max 5, 7. —— The wife of Antigonus, mother of Demetrius Poliorcetes.

STRATONICEA, a city of Caria between Alabanda and Athnida, one of the three most important cities in the interior of the country. It was built by Antiochus Soter, and called after his wife Stratonice It was considerably enlarged and beautified by Hadrian It is now Eskihissar Strab 14 —Liv 33 14 et 38 —A city near mount Taurus, called Stratonicea ad Taurum to distinguish it from the former. Strab 14.

STRATONIS TURRIS, a city of Judæa, afterwards called Cæsarea by Herod, in honour of Augustus Vid Cæsarea.

STRONGȲLE, one of the Lipari isles, or the first of the Æolidæ Insulæ to the north-east It was called Strongyle (Στρογγύλη) by the Greeks on account of its round figure, whence, by corruption, the modern name Stromboli. It is about nine miles in circumference It consists of a single conical mountain, having on one side of it several small craters, one of which is in ceaseless activity, having in all probability continued so during the last 2000 years. The crater is placed upon the slope of the mountain. The gaseous fluids escape from the volcano in successive explosions, the greater ones at intervals of about seven minutes, and the lesser ones almost continually. The lava is thrown out only as projected scoriæ, and is seldom or never discharged in any quantity. Mela, 2. 7.—Strab 6.

STROPHADES, small islands off the coast of Elis, in the Ionian sea They were two in number, and belonged to the territory of Cyparissa. They were first called Plotæ, but took their name of Strophades, from the circumstance of Zetes and Calais, the sons of Boreas, having returned from thence (στρέφω, versus) after they had driven the Harpies thither from the table of Phineus. They are known to navigators at the present day by the name of Strivali. Strab. 8.—Apoll Rhod. 2. 293.

STROPHIUS, a son of Crisus, king of Phocis. He married a sister of Agamemnon, called Anaxibia, or Astyochia, or, according to others, Cydragora, by whom he had Pylades, celebrated for his friendship with Orestes. After the murder of Agamemnon by Clytemnestra and Ægysthus, the king of Phocis, educated ous own house, with the greatest care, his nephew, whom Electra had secretly removed from the dagger of his mother and her adulterer. Orestes was enabled, by means of Strophius, to revenge the death of his father Paus 2, 29. — Hygin fab. 1, 17. — A son of Pylades by Electra, the sister of Orestes.

STRYMON, a large river of Thrace, forming the boundary of that country on the side of Macedonia It rises in the chain of mount Scomius, and, after a course of nearly 200 miles, runs into a part of the Ægean sea, to which it communicated the name of Strymonicus Sinus, now Golfo di Contessa Not far from its mouth it passed through Cercinitis Palus, now Lake Tachinos. The Strymon gave its name to a wind which was prevalent in the gulf into which that river discharges itself, and blew with great violence from the north. The Strymon was also celebrated for its eels The modern name of this river is Carasou, or the Black river. Strab. Rpit 7. — Herod. 8, 118. — Antiph. ap Athen. 7, 56

STYMPHALIS, a region of Macedonia, south of Orestis, and annexed to the former country upon the conquest of that kingdom by the Romans. Liv. 45, 30. — Palus, a lake of Arcadia, near the town of Stymphalus, and once the fabled haunt of birds, thence called Stymphalides Pausanias imagines that these came from Arabia, as there existed some of the same name in that country. The Stymphalian lake was supposed to communicate with the Erasinus, a small river of Argolis. The emperor Hadrian caused water to be conveyed from a fountain in the Stymphalian territory to Corinth. Apollod. 2, 5. 6 — Paus 8, 22 — Herod. 6, 76. — Strab. 8

STYMPHALUS, a town of Arcadia, north-east of Orchomenus, and near the confines of Achaia Its antiquity is attested by Pindar, who calls it the mother of Arcadia. Its remains are about an hour to the west-south-west to Zaraka, and stand upon a rocky eminence rising from the north-east side of the lake. Paus 8, 22.—Pind Olymp. 6, 167.

STYRUS, a king of Albania, to whom Æetes promised his daughter Medea in marriage, to obtain his assistance against the Argonauts Flacc 3, 497. 8, 459.

STYX, a daughter of Oceanus and Tethys. She married Pallas, by whom she had three daughters, Victory, Strength, and Valour Hesiod Theog. 383 et 384.—Apollod 1, 2.—A celebrated river of hell, round which it flows nine times According to some writers, the Styx was a small river of Nonacris in Arcadia, whose waters were so cold and poisonous, that they proved fatal to such as tasted them. Among others, Alexander the Great is mentioned as a victim to their fatal poison, in consequence of drinking them. They even consumed iron, and broke all vessels. The wonderful properties of this water suggested the idea, that it was a river of hell, especially when it disappeared in the earth a little below its fountain-head. The gods held the waters of the Styx in such veneration, that they always swore by them; an oath which was inviolable. If any of the gods had perjured themselves, Jupiter obliged them to drink the waters of the Styx, which lulled them for one whole year into a senseless stupidity; for the nine following years they were deprived of the ambrosia and the nectar of the gods, and after the expiration of the years of their punishment they were restored to the assembly of the deities and to all their original privileges It is said that this veneration was shown to the Styx, because it received its name from the nymph Styx, who with her three daughters, assisted Jupiter in his war against the Titans. Hesiod Theog. 384, 775 — Homer. Od. 10, 513.— Herod. 6, 74 — Virg. Æn. 6, 323, 439, &c. — Apollod. 1, 3. Ovid. Met. 3, 29, &c — Lucan. 6, 375, &c.

SUADA, the goddess of Persuasion, called Pitho by the Greeks.

SUBLICIUS the first bridge erected at Rome over the Tiber Vid. Pons

SUBURRA, a street at Rome, where all the licentious, dissolute, and lascivious Romans and courtezans resorted. It was situate between mounts Viminalis and Quirinalis, and was remarkable as having been the residence of the obscure years of Julius Cæsar. Suet in Cæs. — Varro, de L. L. 4, 8.—Martial. 6, 66.—Juv 3, 5.

SUCRO, now Xucar, a river of Hispania Tarraconensis, in the territory of the Contestani. It rises in mount Idubeda, and falls into the Mediterranean Mela, 2, 6.—Plin. 3, 3 — A city of Hispania Tarraconensis, in the territory of the Edetani, and at the mouth of the river Sucro. It lay between Carthago Nova and the river Iberus. Its modern name is Cullera. Plin. 3, 3. — Liv 28, 26. 29, 10.

SUESSA, Pometia, an ancient Volscian city, the site of which must ever remain a matter of conjecture. It appears to have been in the neighbourhood of the Pomptina Paludes, to which it gave name. This town was taken by Tarquinius Superbus, who with the plunder he there obtained, laid the foundations of the Capitol. It was a colony of Alba Liv. 1, 53.—Dion. 1, 4. — Virg Æn. 6 775 — Aurunca, the capital of the Aurunci. Vid Aurunci.

SUESSIONES, a people of Gallia Belgica, between the Remi, Veromandui, Vadocasses, Meldi, and Catalauni. Their capital, Augusta, afterwards Suessiones, now Soissons, stands on Oxona, now the Aisne. Cæs. B. G. 8, 6.—Liv. Epit. 104 Plin 4, 17.

SUETONIUS C Paulinus, a Roman commander, who, in the reign of Claudius, made war upon the Mauri, and was the first Roman general that crossed mount Atlas with an army. He commanded subsequently in Britain, and there crushed a dangerous rebellion. He wrote an account of his campaign in Africa. — C. Tranquillus, a Roman historian, was the son of Suetonius Lenis, tribune of a legion in the time of Otho. He is designated by Pliny the younger, as one of the scholastici. He was probably a teacher of grammar and rhetoric, composed fictitious pleadings, and, perhaps, sometimes pleaded real causes With Pliny he was intimate, and was indebted to him for several favours. By his interest he obtained the dignity of military tribune, and also the jus trium liberorum, granted to him by the emperor Trajan, though he was childless He was afterwards secretary to the emperor Adrian, though he lost this office by his indiscreet familiarity with the empress Sabina; an incident which occurred about A. D. 121, but how long or in what condition he afterwards lived, no records inform us. Suidas ascribes to him several works; but all are lost except his lives of the Cæsars, his lives of eminent grammarians, and a small part of those of eminent rhetoricians. His lives of the first twelve emperors, down to Domitian inclusively, is one of the most interesting remains of ancient history; for, without being distinguished by style or sentiment, it abounds with anecdotes relative to the manners, characters, and incidents of those times, which no where else occur. Some of the facts which he relates have been doubted; but his general character and mode of writing narratives, acquit him of any intentional misrepresentation; though he indicates a propensity to pay undue attention to vulgar tales and surmises. His freedom in exposing the infamy of the Cæsars may be politically vindicated on this general principle, that history affords no lessons more instructive than the crimes and vices consequent upon despotic power. The best editions of Suetonius are, that of Pitiscus, 2 vols. 8vo. Leov. 1714, that of Oudendorp, 2 vols. 8vo. L. Bat 1751, that of Ernesti, 2 vols 8vo. Lips. 1775, but particularly that of Crusius, 3 vols. 8vo. Lips 1816—18 There is an English translation by Dr Alexander Thomson.

SUEVI, a name given to a large body of various people in Germany, and not the denomination of any particular tribe. Their country was called Suevia, an appellation still retained to that of the modern Swabia, to which a horde of them had found their way from the interior parts of their country. The Angli, Langobardi, Semnones, Catti, and other less important nations, bore the general name of Suevi, which, according to some, was applied uninterruptedly to the tribes dwelling between the banks of the Danube and the Sinus Codanus. Cæs. B. G. 4, 1, &c.—Tacit. Germ. 38, 45 - Plin. 4, 14.

SUFFENUS, a Latin poet in the age of Catullus. He was but of moderate abilities. Catull. 22.

SUFFETIUS, or SUFETIUS. Vid Metius.

SUIDAS, a Greek lexicographer, of whom no particulars are recorded; but he is supposed by some to have lived between 900 and 1025 A D. His Lexicon is particularly valuable, on account of the excellent passages which it contains, taken from authors whose works are now lost. The best edition is that of Kuster, 3 vols. fol. Cantab. 1705.

SUIONES, a people of Scandinavia, in whose name that of the modern Swedes seems to lie concealed. Their fleet was thought worthy of notice. Tacit. de Germ. 44.

SULCIUS, an informer whom Horace describes as hoarse with the number of defamations he daily made. Horat. Sat. 1, 4, 63.

SULLA. Vid Sylla

SULMO, a city of Latium, which stood on the site of the modern Sermonetta Vecchia. Virg Æn. 10, 517.——A city of the Peligni, about seven miles south-east of Corfinium, said to have been founded by Solymus, one of the companions of Æneas It was the birth-place of Ovid, who has made us acquainted with that fact in more than one passage. It was exposed to all the vengeance of Sylla, for having been attached to the cause of Marius. Ovid. Fast. 4, 79.—Sil. Ital. 9, 76.—Flor. 3, 21.——A Latin chief killed in the night by Nisus, as he was going with his companions to destroy Euryalus. Virg. Æn. 9, 412.

SULPITIA, a daughter of Paterculus, who married Fulvius Flaccus. She was so famous for her chastity, that she consecrated a temple to Venus Verticordia, a goddess who was implored to turn the hearts of the Roman women to virtue. Plin. 7, 35.——A poetess in the age of Domitian, against whom she wrote a poem, because he had banished the philosophers from Rome. This composition is still extant. She had also written a poem on conjugal affection, commended by Martial, 10, ep. 35, now lost.——A daughter of Serv. Sulpitius, mentioned in the 4th book of elegies, falsely attributed to Tibullus.

SULPITIA LEX, militaris, by C. Sulpicius, the tribune, A. U. C. 665, invested Marius with the full power of the war against Mithridates, of which Sylla was to be deprived. ——Another, de senatu, by Servius Sulpicius, the tribune. A U. C. 665. It required that no senator should owe more than 2000 drachmæ ——Another, de civitate, by P. Sulpicius, the tribune, A U. C. 665. It ordered that the new citizens who composed the eight tribes lately created, should be divided among the thirty five old tribes, as a great honour.——Another called also Sempronia, de religione, by P. Sulpicius Saverrio and P. Sempronius Sophus, consuls. A U C 449 It forbade any person to consecrate a temple or altar without the permission of the senate and the majority of the tribunes.

SULPITIUS, or SULPICIUS, an illustrious family at Rome, of whom the most celebrated are——Peticus, a man chosen dictator against the Gauls. His troops mutinied when he first took the field, but soon after he engaged the enemy, and totally defeated them.——Saverrio, a consul who gained a victory over the Æqui Liv. 9, 45.—— C. Paterculus, a consul sent against the Carthaginians. He conquered Sardinia and Corsica, and obtained a complete victory over the enemy's fleet. He was honoured with a triumph at his return to Rome.—— Spurius, one of the three commissioners whom the Romans sent to collect the best laws which could be found in the different cities and republics of Greece —— Publius, one of the associates of Marius, well known for his intrigues and cruelty. He made some laws in favour of the allies of Rome, and he kept about 3000 young men in continual pay, whom he called his ante-senatorial band, and with these he had often the impertinence to attack the consul in the popular assemblies. He became at last so seditious, that he was proscribed by Sylla's adherents, and immediately murdered. His head was fixed on a pole on the rostra, where he had often made many seditious speeches in the capacity of tribune. Liv. 77 ——C. Lungus, a Roman consul, who defeated the Samnites, and killed 30,000 of their men He obtained a triumph for this celebrated victory He was afterwards made dictator to conduct a war against the Etrurians.——Apollinaris, a grammarian in the age of the emperor M. Aurelius. He left some letters and a few grammatical observations, now lost.

SUMMANUS, a surname of Pluto, as prince of the dead, summus manium. He had a temple at Rome, erected during the wars with Pyrrhus, and the Romans believed that the thunderbolts of Jupiter were in his power during the night. Cic. de Div. 1, 10. - Ovid. Fast. 6, 731.

SUNIUM, a celebrated promontory of Attica, forming the extreme point of that province towards the south. Near the promontory stood the town of the same name with a har-

Sunium was held especially sacred to Minerva as early as the time of Homer Neptune was also worshipped here, as we learn from Aristophanes. Regattas were held here during the minor Panathenaic festivals. The promontory of Sunium is frequently mentioned in Grecian history. Herodotus in one place calls it the Sunian angle (τὴν γωνίην τὴν Σουνιακήν.) Thucydides reports that it was fortified by the Athenians after the Sicilian expedition, to protect their vessels which conveyed corn from Eubœa, and were consequently obliged to double the promontory. It is now called Cape Colonna, from the ruins of the temple of Minerva, which are still to be seen on its summit Plin. 1, 1.—Homer. Od 3, 278. - Aristoph. Equit. 558 — Herod. 4, 99 — Thucyd. 8, 4.— Virruv. 4, 7

SUOVITAURILIA, a sacrifice among the Romans, which consisted of the immolation of a sow (sus), a sheep (ovis), and a bull (taurus), whence the name. It was generally observed every fifth year.

SUPERUM MARE, a name of the Adriatic sea, because it was situate above Italy. The name of Mare Inferum was applied for the opposite reasons to the sea below Italy. Cic pro Cluent. &c.

SURENA, a powerful officer in the armies of Orodes, king of Parthia. His family had the privilege of crowning the kings of Parthia. He was appointed to conduct the war against the Romans, and to protect the kingdom of Parthia against Crassus, who wished to conquer it. He defeated the Roman triumvir, and after he had drawn him perfidiously to a conference, he ordered his head to be cut off He afterwards returned to Parthia, mimicking the triumphs of the Romans. Orodes ordered him to be put to death, B. C. 52 Surena has been admired for his valour, his sagacity as a general, and his prudence and firmness in the execution of his plans; but his perfidy, his effeminate manners, and his lasciviousness have been deservedly censured. Polyæn. 7.—Plut in Crass.

SURRENTUM, now Sorrento, a city of Campania on the lower shore of the Sinus Crater, and near the Promontorium Minervæ. It was said to have derived its name from the Sirens who frequented this coast, and had a temple erected to them here. Surrentum appears to have become a Roman colony in the reign of Augustus. The wine of the Surrentine hills was held in great estimation by the ancients. Strab. 5.—Stat. Sylv 2, 2. 3, 5.— Ovid. Met. 15, 710.—Mart 13, 110.

SUSA, or SHUSHAN, the capital of Susiana, in Persis, situated on the east side of the Eulæus or Choaspes. It is stated in the mythology of the Greeks to have been founded by Tithonus, brother of Priam king of Troy, but afterwards to have been completed by his son Memnon, for which reason the citadel is sometimes called Memnonium, and the city itself Memnonia. It is said to have derived its name from the number of lilies, which grew in its neighbourhood, Shushan signifying in the Persian language a lily It was enlarged and beautified by Darius Hystaspis, and became the winter residence as Ecbatana was the summer residence of the Persian kings It was such an exceedingly wealthy city, that Alexander the Great is said to have found in it 50,000 talents of uncoined gold, besides wedges of silver, and jewels of inestimable value. Its ruins are now called Shuster. Plin. 6, 26, &c. - Lucan 2, 49. - Strab. 15. Xenoph. Cyr.—Propert. 2, 13.—Claudian de Gild. 31

SUSIANA, or SUSIS, a country of Asia, of which the capital was called Susa, situate at the east of Assyria. It is now called Khuzistan. Vid. Susa.

SUSIDÆ PYLÆ, narrow passes over mountains from Susiana into Persia. Curt 5, 3.

SUTHUL, a town of Numidia, where the king's treasures were kept. Sall Jug. 37.

SUTRIUM, now Sutri, a town of Etruria, about eight miles to the west of Nepete, and in a north-eastern direction from Cære. It was a town of some note, and was considered by the Romans as an important acquisition in furtherance of their designs against Etruria. Having been surprised by the latter power, it fell into their hands, but was almost immediately recovered by Camillus. Liv. 6, 3. – Patere. 1, 14. — Plaut. Cas. 3, 1, 10.

SYAGRUS, an ancient poet, the first who wrote on the Trojan war. He is called Sagaras by Diogenes Laertius, who adds that he lived in Homer's age, of whom he was the rival. Ælian. V. H 13, 21

SYBARIS, a river of Lucania running by the city of the same name, and falling into the Sinus Tarentinus. Its waters were said to render horses shy. It is now the Coehile. Strab. 6. - Ælian. H. N. 2, 26.——A celebrated city of Lucania, on the Sinus Tarentinus, and near the confines of Bruttium. It was situate between the rivers Sybaris and Crathis, and is said to have been founded by the people of Trœzene, not long after the siege of Troy. But these were subsequently joined by a more numerous colony of Achæans, under the conduct of Ilcilcus, about 720 A C The rise and progress of this celebrated republic must have been wonderfully rapid. We are told that it held dominion over four different people, and twenty-five towns; and that the city extended fifty stadia, or upwards of six miles, along the Crathis. But the number of its inhabitants, which are computed at 300,000 by several ancient writers, and which are said to have been actually brought into the field, is so prodigious, as to raise considerable doubts as to the accuracy of these statements. The accounts which we have of their luxury and opulence are not less extraordinary: to such a degree, indeed, did they indulge their taste for pleasure, that a Sybarite and a voluptuary became synonymous terms. But this prosperity and excess of luxury were not of long duration; and the fall of Sybaris was hastened with a rapidity only equalled by that of its sudden elevation. The Crotoniates, B. C. 510, defeated the Sybarites, broke down the dams that confined the Crathis and inundated the city. Most of the inhabitants were massacred, and the few that escaped were cut to pieces by an Athenian colony, who removed to some distance and founded Thurii [Vid. Thurii], which, in process of time, became a considerable state under the discipline of Charondas, and long flourished under the dominion of Rome; till, falling to decay, a colony was sent thither, after which event it assumed the name of Copia. Aristot. Polit 5 3.– Strab 6 - Athen. 12, 3, &c — Diod Sic. 12, 9 — Herod. 5, 44 ——A friend of Æneas killed by Turnus. Virg. Æn. 12, 363.— Horat. Od. 1, 8, 2.

SYBARITA, an inhabitant of Sybaris. Vid. Sybaris

SYENE, now Es-souan, the frontier town of Egypt towards Ethiopia, and reckoned one of the keys of the Roman empire. It was only a few miles north of the Tropic of Cancer, wherefore, at the time of the summer solstice, all bodies were seen there at noon without shadows: to show this phenomenon more strikingly, the inhabitants dug a deep pit, which at the proper season was wholly illuminated. Juvenal was sent hither, into a kind of honourable banishment, by being made the commander of a prætorian cohort stationed in the neighbourhood. Strab. 1. et 2. - Mela, 1, 9.—Plin. 36, 8.—Ovid. ex Pont. 1, 5, 79. Met. 5, 74.—Lucan 2, 587. 8, 851. 10 241.

SYENNESIUS, a Cilician who, with Labinetus of Babylon, concluded a peace between Alyattes, king of Lydia, and Cyaxares king of Media, while both armies were terrified by a sudden eclipse of the sun, B. C. 585. Herod 1, 74.

SYENNESIS, a satrap of Cilicia, when Cyrus made war against his brother Artaxerxes. He wished to favour both the brothers by sending one of his sons in the army of Cyrus, and another to Artaxerxes.

SYLLA, L. CORNELIUS, a celebrated Roman of a noble family. The poverty of his early years was relieved by the liberality of the courtesan Nicopolis, who left him heir to a large fortune; and with the addition of the immense wealth of his mother-in-law, he soon appeared one of the most opulent of the Romans. He first entered the army under the great Marius, whom he accompanied to Numidia in the capacity of quæstor. He rendered himself conspicuous in military affairs, and Bocchus, one of the princes of Numidia, delivered Jugurtha into his hands for the Roman consul. The rising fame of Sylla gave umbrage to Marius, who was always jealous of an equal, as well as of a superior; but the ill language which he might use, rather inflamed than extinguished the ambition of Sylla. He left the conqueror of Jugurtha, and carried arms under Catulus. Some time after, he obtained the prætorship, and was appointed by the Roman senate to place Ariobarzanes on the throne of Cappadocia, against the views and interests of Mithridates, king of Pontus. This he easily effected. One battle left him victorious; and before he quitted the plains of Asia, the Roman prætor had the satisfaction to receive in his camp the ambassadors of the king of Parthia, who wished to make a treaty of alliance with the Romans. Sylla received them with haughtiness, and behaved with such arrogance, that one of them exclaimed, Surely this man is master of the world, or doomed to be such! At his return to Rome, he was commissioned to finish the war with the Marsi, and when this was successfully ended, he was rewarded with the consulship, in the 50th year of his age. In this capacity he wished to have the administration of the Mithridatic war; but he found an obstinate adversary in Marius, and he attained the summit of his wishes only when he had entered Rome sword in hand. After he had slaughtered all his enemies, he set a price upon the head of Marius, and put to death the tribune Sulpitius, who had continually opposed his views, he marched towards Asia, and disregarded the flames of discord, which he left behind him unextinguished. Mithridates was already master of the greatest part of Greece; and Sylla, when he reached the coast of Peloponnesus, was delayed by the siege of Athens and of the Piræus. His operations were carried on with vigour, and when he found his money fail, he made no scruple to take the riches of the temples of the gods, to bribe his soldiers and render them devoted to his service. His boldness succeeded; the Piræus surrendered; and the conqueror, as ill struck with reverence at the beautiful porticoes where the philosophic followers of Socrates and Plato had often disputed, spared the city of Athens, which he had devoted to destruction, and forgave the living for the sake of the dead. Two celebrated battles at Chæronæa and Orchomenos rendered him master of Greece. He crossed the Hellespont, and attacked Mithridates in the very heart of his kingdom. The artful monarch, who well knew the valour and perseverance of his adversary, made proposals of peace; and Sylla, whose interest at home was then decreasing, did not hesitate to put an end to a war which had rendered him master of so much territory, and which enabled him to return to Rome like a conqueror, and to dispute with his rival the sovereignty of the republic with a victorious army. Muræna was left at the head of the Roman forces in Asia, and Sylla hastened to Italy. In the plains of Campania he was met by a few of his adherents, whom the success of his rivals had banished from the capital; and he was soon informed, that if he wished to contend with Marius, he must encounter fifteen generals, followed by twenty-five well-disciplined legions. In these critical circumstances he had recourse to artifice, and while he proposed terms of accommodation to his adversaries, he secretly strengthened himself, and saw, with pleasure, his armies daily increase by the revolt of soldiers whom his bribes or promises had corrupted. Pompey who afterwards merited the surname of Great, embraced his cause, and marched to his camp with three legions. Soon after he appeared in the field with advantage; the confidence of Marius decayed with his power, and Sylla entered Rome like a tyrant and a conqueror. The streets were daily filled with dead bodies, and 7000 citizens, to whom the conqueror had promised pardon, were suddenly massacred in the circus. The senate, at that time assembled in the temple of Bellona, heard the shrieks of their dying countrymen, and when they inquired into the cause of it, Sylla coolly replied, They are only a few rebels whom I have ordered to be chastised. If this had been the last and most dismal scene, Rome might have been called happy; but it was only the beginning of her misfortunes: each succeeding day exhibited a greater number of slaughtered bodies, and when one of the senators had the boldness to ask the tyrant when he meant to stop his cruelties, Sylla, with an air of unconcern answered, that he had not yet determined, but that he would take it into his consideration. The slaughter was continued; a list of such as were proscribed was daily stuck in the public streets. The slave was rewarded to bring his master's head, and the son was not ashamed to imbrue his hands in the blood of his father for money. No less than 4700 of the most powerful and opulent were slain, and Sylla wished the Romans to forget his cruelties in aspiring to the title of perpetual dictator. In this capacity he made new laws, abrogated such as were inimical to his views, and changed every regulation where his ambition was obstructed. After he had finished whatever the most absolute sovereign may do, from his own will and authority, Sylla abdicated the dictatorial power, and retired to a solitary retreat at Puteoli, where he spent the rest of his days, if not in literary ease and tranquillity, yet far from the noise of arms, in the midst of riot and debauchery. The companions of his retirement were the most base and licentious of the populace, and Sylla took pleasure still to wallow in voluptuousness, though on the verge of life, and covered with infirmities. His intemperance hastened his end. his blood was corrupted and an imposthume was bred in his bowels. He at last died in the greatest torments of the lousy disease, about 75 years before Christ, in the 60th year of his age, and it has been observed, that, like Marius, on his death-bed, he wished to drown the stings of conscience and remorse by continual intoxication. His funeral was very magnificent, his body was attended by the senate and the vestal virgins, and hymns were sung to celebrate his exploits and to honour his memory. A monument was erected in the field of Mars, on which appeared an inscription written by himself, in which he said, that the good services he had received from his friends, and the injuries of his enemies, had been returned with unexampled usury. The character of Sylla is that of an ambitious, dissimulating, credulous, tyrannical, debauched, and resolute commander. He was revengeful in the highest degree, and the surname of Felix, or the Fortunate, which he assumed, showed that he was more indebted to fortune than to valour for the great fame which he had acquired. But in the midst of all this, who cannot admire the moderation and philosophy of a man, who, when absolute master of a republic, which he had procured by his cruelty and avarice, silently abdicates the sovereign power, challenges a critical examination of his administration, and retires to live securely in the midst of thousands whom he has injured and offended? The Romans were pleased and astonished at his abdication; and when the insolence of a young man had been vented against the dictator, he calmly answered, This usage may perhaps deter another from resigning his power, to whom my example will never be become absolute. Sylla has been commended for the patronage which he gave to the arts and sciences. He brought from Greece the extensive library of Apellicon, the Peripatetic philosopher, in which were the works of Aristotle and Theophrastus, and he himself composed twenty-two books of memoirs concerning himself. *Cic. in Verr. & c.—C. SYMMACHUS, consul of Rome, A.D 391. He warmly opposed the Christian religion; but when banished by Theodosius, was glad to take refuge in a church to save his life. The best edition of his epistles is that of Scioppius, 4to. Mogunt 1608.

SYMPLEGADES or CYANEÆ, two islands or rocks at the entrance of the Euxine sea. Vid. Cyaneæ.

SYNCELLUS (GEORGE) an historian of Constantinople, who lived about A D. 792. The name Syncellus belonged to him as the officiating attendant on the patriarch, correspondent with the situation of archdeacon. The person here mentioned was a monk, and the compiler of a chronography, which Goar published in Greek and Latin, in 1652, folio. It is valuable for the account which it gives of the dynasties of Egypt.

SYNESIUS, a bishop, was born at Cyrene in Africa, and studied under Hypatia at Alexandria. He went about A D 400, on an embassy to Constantinople, where he pronounced, before the emperor Arcadius, an oration on government; and delivered a pathetic representation of the sufferings which his native country endured from the Goths. In 410 he was chosen bishop of Ptolemais, much against his own inclination. He was far from being orthodox in his belief, particularly on the doctrine of the resurrection of the same body. His works were published by Petavius at Paris, in 1612, and again in 1633, with notes. His style is florid, but his letters are valuable.—A philosopher, who wrote a commentary on the work of Democritus respecting things of a physical and mystical nature. It is found in the Bibliotheca Græca of Fabricius, vol. 8 p. 233.

SYNNAS (adis,) or SYNNADA, (orum,) a town of Phrygia north west of the plain of Ipsus. It was greatly famed among the Romans for the beautiful marble furnished by the neighbouring quarries, and which was commonly called Synnadic, from the town, but the people of the country gave it the name of Docimates from Docimia, the precise place where it was excavated from the quarry. This beautiful substance was of a light colour, interspersed with purple spots and veins. Strab 12. Claudian in Eutrop. 2.—Martial 9, 77.—Stat Silv. 1, 5, 41

SYPHAX, a king of the Massæsylli in Libya, who married Sophonisba, the daughter of Asdrubal, and forsook the alliance of the Romans to join himself to the interest of his father-in-law, and of Carthage. He was conquered in a battle by Masinissa, the ally of Rome, and given to Scipio the Roman general. The conqueror carried him to Rome, where he adorned his triumph. Syphax died in prison 201 years before Christ, and his possessions were given to Masinissa. According to some, the descendants of Syphax reigned for some time over a part of Numidia, and continued to make opposition to the Romans. Liv 24, &c. - *Plut. in Scip. SYRACOSIA, festivals at Syracuse, celebrated during ten days, in which women were busily employed in offering sacrifices —— Another, yearly observed near the lake of Syracuse, where, as they supposed, Pluto had disappeared with Proserpine.

SYRACUSÆ a celebrated city of Sicily, founded B C 732, by a Corinthian colony under Archias, in conjunction with some Dorians. Its name was originally derived from the marsh Syr geo, now known as Il Pantano, and lying along the right bank of the Anapus, now the Alfeo. The colonists settled at first in the island Ortygia, which they named Ortygia from its resemblance to a quail, it was also simply called Nasos. The city soon extended beyond the narrow channel which separated the island from the main land, and Acradina, extendingthence far to northward, formed its second portion; near the limits of these two divisions of the city, which always remained the most important and splendid of the whole, Jove was an altar erected to Concord. Tycha, to the west of Acradina, was shortly afterwards added to the city, which was subsequently increased by Neapolis to the south of Tycha, and west of Acradina. From these four divisions the city was sometimes called Tetrapolis: when Dionysius inclosed Epipolæ, which lay to the extreme west, it was called Pentapolis, but the last-mentioned district was not occupied by habitations. It was supposed to be the largest city which then existed in the world. The people of Syracuse were wealthy and powerful, though subject to tyrants, and possessing a very circumscribed territory, they extended their influence and renown over the councils and enterprises of many dependent states. It fell into the hands of the Romans under the consul Marcellus, after a siege of three years, B.C 212. Of this city were Archimedes the geometrician, who during the siege by the Romans, constructed machines which annoyed them greatly; the historians Philistus and Vopiscus; the poets Theocritus, Philemon, and Epicharmus; and many other great and brave men Thucyd. 6, 3. Cic in Verr. 4, 52 et 53 —Strab. 1 et 8 —C Nep. 20, 3. —Mela, 2, 7 —Liv. 24, &c.—Plut in Marcel &c.—Flor. 2, 6.—Ital 14, 278

SYRIA, a country of Asia, bounded on the north by the range of Taurus, on the east by the Euphrates and a small portion of Arabia; on the south by Arabia and Egypt, and on the west by the Mediterranean. It was divided into the three great divisions of Syria Proper, Phœnice, and Palæstina, or Judæa. Syria is also called Assyria, as forming part of that great empire; and the two names, though sufficiently defined in geography, are often used indiscriminately in history. The name of Syria, which is supposed to have been derived from Sora or Tyre, does not appear to have been applied to the country until this city had risen to the pre-eminence it enjoyed. The old Greeks called the inhabitants of Syria, Armenia, and Mesopotamia, Arimæi, or Arimi; a name which they doubtlessly derived from Aram, one of the sons of Shem, to whose lot these countries first fell (with the exception of Phœnice and Palestine); they seem, also, to have extended the appellation to the Leuco-Syri of Asia Minor. Syria, prior to its invasion by the Assyrians, does not appear to have been governed by one king; for, besides the Phœnicians and the Jews, who were a people distinct from all others, there were also the kingdoms of Damascus, of Hamath, and probably other dynasties in the northern part of the country. From the hands of the Assyrians and Medes, the whole of Syria fell under the Persian yoke, to which it remained subject until wrested from it by Alexander the Great, after whose death, Seleucus Nicanor, one of his generals received this province as a part of his lot, in the division of the Macedonian dominions he raised it B C. 312 to an empire, which is known in history as the kingdom of Syria, or Babylon. The Seleucidæ, or successors of this prince governed the country for more than 200 years during which they contested parts of it with the Egyptians, the Parthians, and the Jews the last of their race was Antiochus Asiaticus, who was dethroned by Pompey, B.C 65, and from that time Syria became a Roman province. The new conquerors allowed the ancient divisions of the country to remain, and kept possession of it until it was reduced by the Saracens, A D 640 Herod. 2, 3, et 7. *Apollon. SYROS, now Syra, an island in the Ægean sea, one of the Cyclades, situate between Rhenea and Cythnos It is mentioned by the ancient authors as a fertile and exceedingly salubrious island. It was the country of Pherecydes, the philosopher, who first taught the immortality of the soul. Homer. Od. 15, 402 —Strab. 10.—Plin 4, 12.

SYRTES two gulfs on the northern coast of Africa, one called Syrtis Minor, on the coast of Byzacium, and now the Gulf of Cabes, the other called Syrtis Major, on the coast of Cyrenaica now the Gulf of Sidra. They derived their name from the Greek word συρειν τραhere, owing to the winds and currents drawing in as it were, and engulfing the vessels which traversed them, or as others say, from the winds, and waves influenced by the winds, drawing in there vast quantities of mud, sand, and rocks, which formed a shoal thence called Syrtis The ancient sailors dreaded being cast upon them so much so, that the earlier Greeks asserted the navigation of either Syrtis as an utter impossibility, without the immediate assistance of the gods. Mela, 1. 7. 2. 7.—*Virg. TABERNÆ Rhenanæ, a town of Germany, on the confluence of the Felbach and the Rhine, now Rhin Zabern ——Regiæ, now Bern Castel, on the Moselle.——Triboccorum, a town of Alsace in France, now Saverne

TABOR, a mountain of Galilee. It was called Itabyrius by the Greeks Vid. Itabyrius

TABRACA, a town on the coast of Numidia, and near the limits of the Provincia Zeugitana, now Tabarca It was colonized by the Romans, and was the place where Gildo, the tyrannical governor of the province of Africa, met his death. The woods which surrounded it were crowded with monkies Jur 10, 194.- Plin. 5, 3.

TABURNUS, a lofty mountain in Samnium, the southern declivities of which were covered with olive grounds. It closed in the Caudine pass on the southern side. Its modern name is Taburno Virg G. 2, 38 Æn 12, 715.

TACAPA, a town of Africa at the head of the Syrtis Minor. It is now Cabes Plin 5 4.

TACFARINAS, a Numidian who commanded an army against the Romans in the reign of Tiberius He had formerly served in the Roman legions, but in the character of an enemy he displayed the most inveterate hatred against his benefactor After he had severally defeated the officers of Tiberius, he was at last routed and killed in the field of battle, fighting with uncommon fury, by Dolabella. Tacit. Ann 2, 52 4, 24.

TACHAMPSO, an island in the Nile, near Thebais. The Egyptians held one half of this island, and the rest was in the hands of the Æthiopians. Herod 2

TACHOS, or TACHUS, a king of Egypt, in the reign of Artaxerxes Ochus, against whom he sustained a long war He was assisted by the Greeks, but his confidence in Agesilaus, king of Lacedæmon, proved fatal to him Chabrias, the Athenian, had been entrusted with the fleet of the Egyptian monarch, and Agesilaus was left with the command of the mercenary army. The Lacedæmonian disregarded his engagements, and by joining with Nectanebus, who had revolted from Tachus, he ruined the affairs of the monarch, and obliged him to save his life by flight Some observe that Agesilaus acted with that duplicity to avenge himself upon Tachus, who had insolently ridiculed his short and deformed stature. The expectations of Tachus had been raised by the fame of Agesilaus, but when he saw the lame monarch, he repeated on the occasion the fable of the mountain which brought forth a mouse, upon which Agesilaus replied with asperity, that though he called him a mouse yet he soon should find him to be a lion. C Nep in Ages

TACITUS, C. CORNELIUS, a celebrated Roman historian, was born about A. D 57, at Interamna, the modern Terni. His father was a Roman knight, and procurator of Belgic Gaul. Devoted from his youth to the cultivation of literature and rhetoric, his reputation at maturity was so well established, that he was permitted by Julius Agricola, at the expiration of his consulate, which occurred in the year 77, to form a matrimonial connection with his daughter Thus introduced into public life, he was honoured by the patronage of Vespasian, Titus, and Domitian. Having discharged the office of prætor, he withdrew from the capital for four years; and on his return he found the latter emperor exercising a tyranny which he bitterly lamented. His prospects, however, were brightened by the accession of Nerva to the consulship, in the year 97; and as his associate Verginius Rufus, died before the termination of his office, Tacitus was appointed to be his successor, and commenced his literary career with an eloquent oration at the funeral of Verginius of whom Pliny says that he "crowned the felicity of his life by possessing the most eloquent of eulogists at his death." In the early part of Trajan's reign, he concurred with his friend, Pliny the younger, in the accusation of Marcus Priscus for the crimes with which he was chargeable during his proconsulate of Africa. The conduct of Tacitus and Pliny on this occasion was honoured by the encomium of the senate in their sentence and condemnation of the culprit. The future circumstances of his life, and the precise time of his death, are unknown, but as he makes no allusion to the reign of Adrian, it is most probable that he did not survive that of Trajan. The principal works of Tacitus were his "Annals" and his "History." The former comprehended the Roman affairs from the death of Augustus to that of Nero, but it has been transmitted to us in a very mutilated state The latter comprised the period from the end of Nero to the death of Domitian, and now exists in an imperfect state as the narrative does not extend far beyond the accession of Vespasian. His other works are a "Life of Agricola," and a treatise "On the Manners of the Germans" A "Dialogue concerning Orators," or "On the Causes of the Corruption of Eloquence," has been ascribed to him by some learned critics, and is usually printed with his works, but who was the real author of it is a matter of great uncertainty. In historical reputation perhaps no name stands higher than that of Tacitus, nor has any writer of his class been the subject of more discussion, both with regard to his meaning and his merits. The frequent obscurity of his sentences is the consequence of a style singularly concise, abrupt, and elliptical, of which it is often difficult to make out the grammatical construction, and which abounds more in thoughts than in words. Hence the reader is frequently under the necessity of considering more what he was likely to intend than what his language actually imports, and no one can with advantage peruse him, who is not in some measure prepared to think along with him. It is partly his fault, and partly his excellence, perpetually to aim at saying a great deal in a small compass, and to give to a thought the force of an apophthegm by concentration. This he has commonly done with such effect, that his writings have been the great store-house of political maxims, the energetic brevity of which impresses them indelibly on the memory, but occasionally an affectation appears of converting common remarks into aphorisms, and of philosophizing when he was only required to narrate. It is however to be remarked, that no prose-writer in any language surpasses or perhaps equals him in force of description, and the choice of circumstances by which he dramatizes a scene, and brings it before the eyes of his reader; and no want of perspicuity appears in the style when employed in the relation of striking events. With respect to his moral merits as an historian, the different judgments given can scarcely have proceeded from any thing but the prepossessions of those who gave them; for it is impossible for readers of a liberal and enlightened spirit, the friends of freedom and virtue, not to admire the writer whose great aim appears to be to inculcate the noblest principles of action, both public and private, and to display the evils arising from uncontrolled power, united, as it generally must be, with vice and tyranny. He was guarded by philosophy against credulity, and by the love of truth against calumny. On the whole, whatever defects may be justly imputed to him, his works can never fail to keep a distinguished place among the most valuable treasures which antiquity has bequeathed to us. Of the numerous editions of Tacitus, the following may be mentioned as the most in esteem: that of Gronovius, 2 vols. 4to. L. Bat. 1721; that of Ernesti, 2 vols. 8vo. Lips 1772, that of Brotier, 7 vols. 12mo. Paris, 1776, and that of Oberlinus, 4 parts in 2 vols. 8vo. Lips. 1801. Of the English translations of Tacitus, the best is that by Murphy.—M Claudius, a Roman, elected emperor by the senate, after the death of Aurelian. He would have refused this important and dangerous office, but the pressing solicitations of the senate prevailed, and in the 70th year of his age he complied with the wishes of his countrymen, and accepted the purple. The time of his administration was very popular, the good of the people was his care, and as a pattern of moderation, economy, temperance, regularity, and impartiality, Tacitus found no equal. He abolished the several brothels which under the preceding reigns had filled Rome with licentiousness and obscenity; and by ordering all the public baths to be shut at sun set, he prevented the commission of many irregularities, which the darkness of the night had hitherto sanctioned. The senators under Tacitus seemed to have recovered their ancient dignity, and long lost privileges. They were not only the counsellors of the emperor, but they even seemed to be his masters; and when Florianus, the brother-in-law of Tacitus, was refused the consulship, the emperor said, that the senate, no doubt, could fix upon a more deserving object. As a warrior, Tacitus is inferior to few of the Romans, and during a short reign of about six months, he not only repelled the barbarians who had invaded the territories of Rome in Asia, but he prepared to make war against the Persians and Scythians. He died in Cilicia as he was on his expedition, of a violent distemper, or, according to some, he was destroyed by the secret dagger of an assassin, on the 13th of April, in the 276th year of the Christian era. Tacitus has been commended for his love of learning; and it has been observed, that he never passed a day without consecrating some part of his time to reading or writing. He has been accused of superstition and authors have recorded, that he never studied on the second day of each month, a day which he deemed in auspicious and unlucky. Tacit in Vita.—Zosim

TADER, a river of Spain, near New Carthage.

TÆNARUS, a promontory of Laconia forming the southernmost point of the Peloponnesus. It is now called Cape Matapan, which is a modern Greek corruption from the ancient μέτωπον, a front, the promontory boldly projecting into the Mediterranean. Ancient geographers reckoned from thence to Cape Phycus in Africa 3600 stadia, to Cape Pachynus in Sicily 4600 or 4000, and to the promontory of Malea 670. Here was a celebrated temple of Neptune, with an inviolable asylum, and near it was a cave, said to be the entrance to Orcus, through which Hercules dragged Cerberus to the upper regions. Arion is said to have been landed here by the dolphin, and to have consecrated in the temple of Neptune a small brazen figure of a man seated upon a dolphin's back. Tænarus was also famed for its beautiful green marble, which the Romans held in the highest esteem. About 40 stadia from the promontory stood the city of Tænarus, afterwards called Cænepolis. Strab 8.—Eurip. Cyclop. 293.—Pind. Pyth 4, 77.—*Virg. TAGES, a son of Genius, grandson of Jupiter, was the first who taught the 12 nations of the Etrurians the science of augury and divinat on. It is said that he was found by a Tuscan ploughman in the form of a clod, and that he assumed a human shape to instruct this nation, which became so celebrated for their knowledge of omens and incantations. Cic. de Div. 2, 23.—Ovid Met 15, 558.—Lucan, 1, 623

TAGUS, the largest river of Spain. It rises in Mons Idubeda, whence with a south-western course it flows for 580 miles, through the middle of the Peninsula, till it reaches the Atlantic ocean at Olisipo, now Lisbon. The sands of the Tagus produced grains of gold and precious stones. It is now called by the Portuguese the Tajo, though its ancient name still remains in general use. Mela, 3, 1.—Ovid Met. 2, 251.—Sil. 4, 234.—Lucan. 7, 755.—Martial. 4, 55, &c.—A Latin chief killed by Nisus. Virg Æn 9, 418.—A Trojan, killed by Turnus. Id. 12, 513.

TALASIUS. Vid. Thalasius.

TALTHYBIUS, a herald in the Grecian camp during the Trojan war, the particular minister and friend of Agamemnon. He brought away Briseis from the tent of Achilles by order of his master. Talthybius died at Ægium in Achaia. Hom. Il. 1, 320, &c.—Paus. 7, 23.

TALUS, a youth, son of the sister of Dædalus, who invented the saw, compasses, and other mechanical instruments. His uncle became jealous of his growing fame, and murdered him privately; or, according to others, he threw him down from the citadel of Athens. Talus was changed into a partridge by the gods. He is also called Calus, Acalus, Perdix, and Talaus. Apollod. 3, 1.—Paus. 1, 21.—Ovid. Met 8, 237.—A friend of Æneas killed by Turnus. Virg. Æn. 12, 513.

TAMARA, a town of Britain on the river Tamarus, in the territory of the Dumnonii, and, according to Camden, now Tamerton, near Plymouth.

TAMARIS, a river of Hispania Tarraconensis, on the north-western or Atlantic coast, and a short distance below the Promontorium Artabrum, now the Tambre. Mela, 3, 1.—Plin. 31, 2.

TAMARUS, a river of Britain, now the Tamar ——A river of Samnium, now the Tamaro.

TAMASEA, a beautiful plain of Cyprus, sacred to the goddess of beauty. It was in this place that Venus gathered the golden apples with which Hippomanes was enabled to overtake Atalanta. Ovid. Met. 10 644 --Plin 5.--Strab. 14.

TAMESIS, a river of Britain, now the Thames Cæs B G. 5. 11

TAMOS, a native of Memphis, made governor of Ionia by young Cyrus After the death of Cyrus, Tamos fled into Egypt, where he was murdered on account of his immense treasures. Diod 14.

TANAGRA, a city of Bœotia, situate on an eminence, on the north bank of the Asopus, and near the mouth of that river Its more ancient appellation was Græa An obstinate battle was fought in this neighbourhood, between the Athenians and Lacedæmonians, prior to the Peloponnesian war when the former were defeated. The ruins of Tanagra are to be seen at a spot now called Grimatila, near the village of Skeramouri Homer Il 2, 498.--Lycophr. 615. — Thucyd 1, 108

TANAGRUS or TANAGER, a river of Lucania, rises in the central chain of the Apennines, between Cuasi Nuovo and Lago Negro, and, after flowing 40 miles through the valley of Diano loses itself under ground for the space of two miles. It re appears beyond la Polla, at a place called Pertosa, and falls into the Silarus below Contursi. The modern name of the river is Negro TANAIS, now the Don, a large river of Europe, rising in the Riphæi Montes, or Uchar Mountains, and flowing first with a southerly, and afterwards with a westerly course of 1260 miles, into the Mœotis Palus, or Sea of Azov. It formed the boundary of Sarmatia Europæa, and Asiatica. The people who dwelled upon its banks were called Tanaitæ Mela 1, 19.- Strab. 11 et 16.- Curt. 6, 2. Lucan 3, 275. 8, 319 Propert. 2, 23, 54 — — A city in Asiatic Sarmatia, situate at the mouth of the Tanais, and built by the confederate Greeks of the Bosporus, as the great emporium of their traffic with the Scythians. It became the most important place in the whole country after Panticapæum, which induced it to throw off the yoke of its rulers. It was, however, taken and destroyed by its original founders, though they afterwards thought proper to rebuild it. Its ruins are to the west of the modern Azov Plin 6, 7.

TANAQUIL called also Cæa Cæcilia, was the wife of Tarquin, the 5th king of Rome. She was a native of Tarquinia, where she married Lucumon, better known by the name of Tarquin, which he assumed after he had come to Rome at the representation of his wife, whose knowledge of augury promised him something uncommon. Her expectations were not frustrated; her husband was raised to the throne, and she shared with him the honours of royalty. After the murder of Tarquin Tanaquil raised her son in-law Servius Tullius to the throne, and ensured him the succession. She distinguished herself by her liberality; and the Romans in succeeding ages had such a veneration for her character, that the embroidery which she had made, her girdle, as also the robe of her son-in-law, which she had worked with her own hands, were preserved with the greatest sanctity. Juvenal bestows the appellation of Tanaquil on all such women as were imperious, and had the command of their husbands. Liv. 1, 34, &c. Dionys. Hal. 3, 59. - Flor. 1, 5 et 8.—Hal. 13, 818.

TANIS, now San, a very ancient city of Egypt, about midway between the Mendesian and Pelusiac branches of the Nile. It is called Zoan in the Scriptures, and was the place where Moses performed his miracles in the presence of Pharoah. Numb 13, 23.—Isa 19, 11 et 13

TANTALIDES a patronymic applied to the descendants of Tantalus, such as Niobe, Hermione &c.——Agamemnon and Menelaus, as grandsons of Tantalus, are called Tantalidæ fratres Ovid Heroid 8, 45 et 152.

TANTALUS a king of Lydia, son of Jupiter, by a nymph called Pluto. He was father of Niobe, Pelops, &c., by Dione, one of the Atlantides, called by some Euryanassa Tantalus is represented by the poets as punished in hell with an insatiable thirst, and placed up to the chin in the midst of a pool of water, which, however, flows away as soon as he attempts to taste it. There hangs also above his head a bough, richly loaded with delicious fruits, which, as soon as he attempts to seize it is carried away from his reach by a sudden blast of wind According to some mythologists, his punishment is to sit under a huge stone hung at some distance over his head, and, as it seems every moment ready to fall, he is kept under continual alarms and never-ceasing fears. The causes of this eternal punishment are variously explained Some declare that it was inflicted upon him because he stole a favourite dog, which Jupiter had entrusted to his care to keep his temple in Crete. Others say, that he stole away the nectar and ambrosia from the tables of the gods, when he was admitted into the assemblies of heaven, and that he gave it to mortals on earth. Others support, that this proceeds from his cruelty and impiety in killing his son Pelops, and in serving his limbs as food before the gods, whose divinity and power he wished to try when they had stopped at his house as they passed over Phrygia. Homer Od 11, 581.- Cic Tusc. 1, 5, 4. 10. — Eurip. in Iphig.—Propert. 2, 1, 66.—*Horat. TAPHIÆ, islands in the Ionian sea, to the north-east of Ithaca, or rather, between Leucadia and the coast of Acarnania They form a considerable group, and are often mentioned by Homer and other classical writers as the haunt of notorious pirates The principal island is that which is called by Homer Taphos, but by later writers Taphius and Taphussa, and is probably the one known to modern geographers by the name of Meganisi. The Taphiæ were also called Telebœ. They received these names from Taphius and Telebous, the sons of Neptune, who reigned there. Homer. Od. 1, 181 et 419. 15, 425.—Strab. 10

TAPHIUS, a son of Neptune by Hippothoe, the daughter of Nestor He was king of the Taphiæ, to which he gave his name. Strab. 10. — Apollod 2, 4.

TAPHRÆ, a city in the Tauric Chersonese, on the narrowest part of the isthmus. It is now Perekop, Mela, 2, 1. - Plin 4, 12.

TAPHIOS, the strait between Corcira and Sardinia, now Bonifacio

TAPROBANE, or Salice, as it was called by the natives, an island in the Indian ocean, now known as Ceylon It is said to have been formerly called Palæsimundum, and was imagined by the ancients upon its first discovery to have been the northern part of a new continent or world. Their subsequent investigations, however, proved it to be an island: but they so exaggerated its size as to make it larger than the whole of Great Britain, whereas it only contains 70,400 square miles or about 3800 less than Scotland. Its inhabitants were called Salæ, and were said to be very rich, and to live to a great age; they were governed by a king, who sent an embassy to the emperor Claudius, their chief divinity was said to be Hercules. Ptol. 6. — Strab. 2 — Ovid ex Pont 3. 5, 80.

TAPSUS, a small and lowly situated peninsula on the eastern coast of Sicily Its name has reference to its low situation; from θαπτω, sepelio. It lay off Hybla Virg Æn 3, 649

TARAS, (-antis) a son of Neptune, who built Tarentum, as some suppose.

TARASCO, a town of Gaul, on the eastern side of the Rhone, and north of Arelate It is now Tarascon, lying opposite to Beaucaire TARAXIPPUS, a deity worshipped at Elis. His statue was placed near the race ground, and his protection was implored, that no harm might happen to the horses during the games. Paus. 6, 20, &c.

TARBELLI, a people of Gaul, at the foot of the Pyrenees, which from thence are sometimes called Tarbellæ. Tibull 1, 7, 13. - Lucan 4, 121 — Cæs B G 3 27

TARENTUM, or TARAS, now Taranto, a city of lower Italy, situated in the north eastern angle of the Sinus Tarentinus, and in the territory of Messapia or Japygia. It was founded, or rather repaired by a Lacedæmonian colony, about 707 years before Christ, under the conduct of Phalanthus. Long independent, it maintained its superiority over thirteen tributary cities; and could once arm 100,000 foot, and 3000 horse. The people of Tarentum were very indolent, and as they were easily supplied with all necessaries as well as luxuries from Greece, they gave themselves up to voluptuousness, so that the delights of Tarentum became proverbial. The war which they supported against the Romans, with the assistance of Pyrrhus, king of Epirus, and which has been called the Tarentine war, is greatly celebrated in history. This war, which had been undertaken B.C 281, by the Romans to avenge the insults the Tarentines had offered to their ships when near their harbour, was terminated after ten years; 300,000 prisoners were taken, and Tarentum became subject to Rome. The government of Tarentum was democratical; there were, however, some monarchs who reigned there It was for some time the residence of Pythagoras, who inspired the citizens with the love of virtue, and rendered them superior to their neighbours in the cabinet as well as in the field of battle. The large, beautiful, and capacious harbour of Tarentum is greatly commended by ancient historians. Flor. 1, 18. — *Val. TARICHÆA, a strong city of Palestine, south of Tiberias, and lying at the southern extremity of the lake of Gennesareth, or sea of Tiberias —Several towns on the coast of Egypt bore this name from their pickling fish.

TARPA, SPURIUS MÆTIUS, a critic at Rome in the age of Augustus. He was appointed with four others in the temple of Apollo, to examine the merit of every poetical composition, which was to be deposited in the temple of the Muses. In this office he acted with great impartiality, though many taxed him with want of candour. All the pieces that were represented on the Roman stage had previously received his approbation Horat. Sat. 1, 10, 38.

TARPEIA, the daughter of Tarpeius, the governor of the citadel of Rome, promised to open the gates of the city to the Sabines, provided they gave her their gold bracelets, or, as she expressed it, what they carried on their left hands. Tatius, the king of the Sabines, consented, and as he entered the gates, to punish her perfidy, he threw not only his bracelet but his shield upon Tarpeia. His followers imitated his example, and Tarpeia was crushed under the weight of the bracelets and shields of the Sabine army. She was buried in the capitol, which from her has been called the Tarpeian rock, and there afterwards many of the Roman malefactors were thrown down a deep precipice. Plut. in Rom. - Ovid Fast. 1, 261. Amor. 1, 10, 50 — Liv 1, 11. Propert. 4, 4 —— One of the female attendants of Camilla in the Rutulian war. Virg Æn 11, 656

TARPEIA ROCK, a celebrated rock at Rome, forming a part of the Mons Capitolinus, and on the steepest side, where it overhung the Tiber From this rock state criminals were accustomed to be thrown, in the earlier Roman times It received its name in commemoration of the treachery of Tarpeia, and of her having been killed here by the Sabines. The perpendicular depth of the highest part may be fifty feet, but, as the soil has accumulated exceedingly at the bottom, it may have been nearly double that height.

TARPEIUS, Sp. the governor of the citadel of Rome, under Romulus

TARQUINIA, a daughter of Tarquinius Priscus who married Servius Tullius. When her husband was murdered by Tarquinius Superbus, she privately conveyed away his body by night, and buried it. This preyed upon her mind, and the night following she died. Some have attributed her death to excess of grief, or to suicide, while others, perhaps more justly, have suspected Tullia, the wife of young Tarquin, of the murder.——A vestal virgin, who, as some suppose, gave the Roman people a large piece of land, which was afterwards called the Campus Martius TARQUINII, now Turchina, one of most powerful cities of Etruria, situate near the coast, and to the north-west of Cære. It was the birthplace of Tarquinius Priscus, and the place where Tages, author of the art of divination, was said to have sprung out of the earth, turned up by the plough Strab. 5.—Virg. Æn 8, 506. — Sil. Ital. 8 473.—Ovid Met 15, 553.

TARQUINIUS, PRISCUS, the fifth king of Rome, was son of Demaratus, a native of Greece. His first name was Lucumon, but this he changed when by the advice of his wife Tanaquil he had come to Rome. He calls himself self Lucius, and assumed the surname of Tarquinius, because born in the town of Tarquinii, in Etruria. At Rome he distinguished himself so much by his liberality and engaging manners, that Ancus Martius, the reigning monarch, nominated him, at his death, the guardian of his children. This was insufficient to gratify the ambition of Tarquin; the princes were young, and an artful oration delivered to the people immediately transferred the crown of the deceased monarch on the head of Lucumon. The people had every reason to be satisfied with their choice Tarquin reigned with moderation and popularity. He increased the number of the senate, and made himself friends by electing one hundred new senators from the plebeians, whom he distinguished by the appellation of "Patres minorum gentium,' from those of the patrician body, who were called "Patres majorum gentium." The glory of the Roman arms, which was supported with so much dignity by the former monarchs, was not neglected in this reign, and Tarquin showed that he possessed vigour and military prudence in the victories which he obtained over the united forces of the Latins and Sabines and in the conquest of the twelve nations of Etruria. He repaired, in the time of peace, the walls of the capital, the public places were adorned with elegant buildings and useful ornaments, and many centuries after, such as were spectators of the stately mansions and golden palaces of Nero, viewed with more admiration and greater pleasure the more simple, though not less magnificent edifices of Tarquin. He laid the foundations of the capitol, and to the industry and the public spirit of this monarch, the Romans were indebted for their aqueducts and subterraneous sewers, which supplied the city with fresh and wholesome water, and removed all the filth and ordure, which in a great capital too often breed pestilence and diseases. Tarquin was the first who introduced among the Romans the custom to canvass for offices of trust and honour; he distinguished the monarch, the senators, and other inferior magistrates with particular robes and ornaments, with ivory chairs at spectacles, and the hatchets carried before the public magistrates, were by his order surrounded with bundles of sticks, to strike more terror, and to be viewed with greater reverence. Tarquin was assassinated by the two sons of his predecessor, in the 80th year of his age, 38 of which he had sat on the throne, 578 years before Christ. Dionys. Hal. 3, 59.—Val. Max. 1, 4 3, 2.—Flor. 1, 5, &c. Liv. 1, 31.—Virg. Æn 6 817.—The second Tarquin, surnamed Superbus, from his pride and insolence, was grandson of Tarquinius Priscus. He ascended the throne of Rome after his father-in-law Servius Tullius, and was the seventh and last king of Rome. He married Tullia, the daughter of Tullius, and it was at her instigation that he murdered his father-in-law, and seized the kingdom. The crown which he had obtained with violence, he endeavoured to keep by a continuation of tyranny. Unlike his royal predecessors, he paid no regard to the decisions of the senate, or the approbation of the public assemblies, and by wishing to disregard both, he incurred the jealousy of the one and the odium of the other. The public treasury was soon exhausted by the continual extravagance of Tarquin, and to silence the murmurs of his subjects, he resolved to call their attention to war. He was successful in his military operations; the neighbouring cities submitted; but while the siege of Ardea was continued, the wantonness of the son of Tarquin at Rome for ever stopped the progress of his arms; and the Romans, whom a series of barbarity and oppression had hitherto provoked, no sooner saw the virtuous Lucretia stab herself, not to survive the loss of her honour. [Vid. Lucretia] than the whole city and camp arose with indignation against the monarch. The gates of Rome were shut against him, and Tarquin was for ever banished from his throne, in the year of Rome 244. Unable to find support from even one of his subjects, Tarquin retired among the Etrurians, who attempted in vain to replace him on his throne. The republican government was established at Rome, and all Italy refused any longer to support the cause of an exiled monarch against a nation, who heard the name of Tarquin, of king, and tyrant, mentioned with equal horror and indignation. Tarquin died in the 90th year of his age, about 14 years after his expulsion from Rome He had reigned about 25 years. Though Tarquin appeared so odious among the Romans, his reign was not without its share of glory. His conquests were numerous; to beautify the buildings and porticoes at Rome was his wish, and with great magnificence and care he finished the capitol, which his predecessor of the same name had begun. He also bought the Sibylline books which the Romans consulted with such religious solemnity. [Vid. Collatinus.]——Sextus the eldest of the sons of Tarquin the Proud rendered himself well known by a variety of adventures When his father besieged Gabii, young Tarquin publicly declared that he was at variance with the monarch, and the report was the more easily believed when he came before Gabii with his body all mangled and bloody with stripes This was an agreement between the father and the son, and Tarquin had no sooner declared that this proceeded from the tyranny and oppression of his father, than the people of Gabii entrusted him with the command of their armies, fully convinced that Rome could never have a more inveterate enemy When he had thus succeeded, he dispatched a private messenger to his father, but the monarch gave no answer to be returned to his son. Sextus enquired more particularly about his father, and when he heard from the messenger that when the message was delivered, Tarquin cut off with a stick the tallest poppies in his garden, the son followed the example by putting to death the most noble and powerful citizens of Gabii. The town soon fell into the hands of the Romans. The violence which some time after Tarquinius offered to Lucretia, was the cause of his father's exile, and the total expulsion of his family from Rome. [Vid. Lucretia.] Sextus was at last killed, bravely fighting in a battle during the war which the Latins sustained against Rome in the attempt of re-establishing the Tarquins on their throne. Ovid. Fast.—Liv.

TARRACINA, a city of Latium, situate on the sea-coast, in a north-eastern direction from the Circean promontory. It was also called Anxur and Trachas, and was taken from the Volsci by the Romans, who made it a great naval station It was sacred to Jupiter Anxyrus, who was there represented in the form of a beardless boy Ov. Met. 15. 717. Liv. 4, 59.—Virg. Æn. 7, 799

TARRACO, now Tarragona, a town of the Cosetani in Hispania Citerior, on the coast of the Mediterranean, and north-east of the mouth of the Baetis This was the first place where the Scipios landed in the second Punic war, and which, after having fortified it they made their place of arms, and a Roman colony. Tarraco in consequence of this, soon rose to importance, and in time became the rival of Carthago Nova. It was the usual place of residence for the Roman prætors Plin. 3, 4.—Mela, 2. 6

TARRUITIS. Vid Acca Laurentia

TARSIUS, a river of Troas, near Zeleia, which, as Strabo asserts, travellers had to pass twenty times; but he does not state on what route. It is now called the Tarsa. Str. b. 13.

TARSUS, a celebrated city of Cilicia Campestris, on the river Cydnus, not far from its mouth. was of very ancient date, and was said by some to have been founded by Sardanapalus, others ascribed its origin to an Argive colony, who migrated hither under Triptolemus; and others, again, to Bellerophon and his horse Pegasus, which last losing his head here, caused the city to be called Tarsus Tarsus was made a free colony by the Greeks an honour which was granted to it by the Romans also; and hence St Paul, who was a native of the city, styles himself a free-born Roman It was a very rich and populous place, and had an academy, furnished with men of eminent, that they are said to have excelled in all arts of polite learning and philosophy; even the academies of Alexandria, and Athens, and Rome itself, were indebted to it for their best professors. Alexander nearly lost his life by bathing, when over-heated, in the cold stream of the Cydnus, and it was here that Cleopatra paid her celebrated visit to Antony in all the pomp and pageantry of eastern luxury, herself attired like Venus, and her attendants like Cupids, in a galley covered with gold, whose sails were of purple, the oars of silver, and cordage of silk, a fine description of which may be seen in Shakspeare's play of Antony and Cleopatra, Act 2, scene 2. During the civil war Tarsus espoused the cause of Cæsar so warmly, as to adopt the name of Juliopolis, on which account it was roughly handled by Cassius; but this injury was made up for by the magnificence of the triumviri. Tarsus is still called Tersoos, but is subject to Adana, an adjacent city. Strab. 14.—Xen. Anab. 1, 2.—Arrian, 2, 4.—Acts, 21, 39. 22, 3 et 27.

TARTARUS, (pl. -a, -orum,) one of the regions of hell, where, according to the ancients, the most impious and guilty among mankind were punished. It was surrounded with a brazen wall, and its entrance was continually hidden from the sight by a cloud of darkness, which is represented three times more gloomy than the obscurest night. According to Hesiod it was a separate prison at a greater distance from the earth than the earth is from the heavens. Virgil says, that it was surrounded by three impenetrable walls, and by the impetuous and burning streams of the river Phlegethon. The entrance is by a large and lofty tower, whose gates are supported by columns of adamant, which neither gods nor men can open. In Tartarus, according to Virgil, were punished such as had been disobedient to their parents, traitors, adulterers, faithless ministers, and such as had undertaken unjust and cruel wars, or had betrayed their friends for the sake of money It was also the place where Ixion, Tityus, the Danaides, Tantalus, Sisyphus, &c. were punished, according to Ovid. Hesiod Theog 720.—Ib. 1d, 991.—Virg Æn. 6.—Homer. Od. 11 — Ovid. Met 4, 13.

TARTESSUS, a town of Spain, situate in an island of the same name at the mouth of the Bætis, formed by the two branches of the river No traces of this island now remain, as one of the arms of the river has disappeared. With regard to the actual position of the town itself, much difference of opinion exists both in ancient and modern writers. Mela, 2, 6.—Paus. 6, 19 - Strab 3.

TARUENNA, a city of Gallia Belgica Secunda, in the territory of the Morini, now Therouenne

TARVISIUM, an ancient city of Venetia, on the river Silis. It is now Treviso.

TATIANUS, a Christian writer of the second century, was born in Syria, and flourished about A.D 170. He taught rhetoric with great reputation, before his conversion, after which he became the scholar of Justin Martyr, and attended him to Rome. On the death of his master, he fell into errors respecting the Logos and the operation of demons. His "Oratio ad Græcos" was printed at Oxford in 1700, 12mo.

TATIENSES, a name given to one of the tribes of the Roman people by Romulus, in honour of Tatius, king of the Sabines. The Tatienses, who were partly the ancient subjects of the king of the Sabines, lived on mounts Capitolinus and Quirinalis.

TATIUS, TITUS, king of Cures among the Sabines, made war against the Romans after the rape of the Sabines. The gates of the city were betrayed into his hands by Tarpeia, and the army of the Sabines advanced as far as the Roman forum, where a bloody battle was fought. The cries of the Sabine virgins at last stopped the fury of the combatants, and an agreement was made between the two nations. Tatius consented to leave his ancient possessions, and with his subjects of Cures, to come and live in Rome, which, as stipulated, was permitted still to bear the name of its founder, whilst the inhabitants adopted the name of Quirites, in compliment to the new citizens. After he had for six years shared the royal authority with Romulus, in the greatest union, he was murdered at Lanuvium, B.C. 742, for an act of cruelty to the ambassadors of the Laurentes. This was done by order of his royal colleague, according to some authors. Liv. 1, 10, &c. Plut. in Rom. —Cic. pro Balb.—Ovid Met. 14, 804. Flor. 1, 1.

TATTEA, a long lake in the north-eastern part of Phrygia, now Tusla. Its waters were so impregnated with brine, that if any substance was dropped into the lake, it was presently encrusted with a thick coat of salt, and even birds, when flying near the surface, had their wings moistened with the saline particles, so as to become incapable of rising into the air, and were easily caught. Strab. 12.

TAUNUS, a mountain range of Germany, lying in a north-west direction from Frankfort on the Maine, between Wiesbaden and Hornberg. It is now called the Höhe, or Hey'ich.

TAURI, a people of European Sarmatia, who inhabited Taurica Chersonesus, and sacrificed all strangers to Diana. The statue of this goddess, which they believed to have fallen down from heaven, was carried away to Sparta by Iphigenia and Orestes. Herod. 4, 99, &c.—Mela, 2, 1.—Paus. 3, 16.—Hygin. Iphig.—Ovid ex Pont 1, 2, 80.—Sil. 14, 260 Jun. 15, 116.

TAURICA CHERSONESUS, a large peninsula of Europe, at the south west of the Palus Mæotis, now called the Crimea. It is joined by an isthmus to Scythia, and is bounded by the Cimmerian Bosphorus, the Euxine sea, and the Palus Mæotis. The inhabitants, called Tauri, were a savage and uncivilized nation. Strab. 4.—Plin. 4, 12. Vid. Tauri.

TAURICA, a surname of Diana, because she was worshipped by the inhabitants of Taurica Chersonesus

TAURINI, a people of Liguria, occupying both banks of the Padus, in the earlier part of its course, but especially the country situated between that river and the Alps. Having opposed Hannibal, after his passage of the Alps, he took and plundered their city, Augusta Taurinorum, now Turin, in Piedmont, but it was afterwards raised to the rank of a colony by the Romans. Polyb. 3, 60.—Plin 3, 17. Tacit. Hist 2 66.

TAUROMENIUM, now Taormina a town of Sicily, between Messana and Catana, but nearer the latter than the former. An ancient city named Naxos previously occupied the site of Tauromenium. The hills in the neighbourhood were famous for the fine grapes which they produced, and they surpassed almost the whole world for the extent and beauty of their prospects. Diod 16

TAURUS, the name of a lofty chain of mountains, which, commencing at the Sacrum Promontorium on the Lycian and Pamphylian coast, stretches in a north-easterly direction through Pisidia, Isauria, and Cappadocia, till it is intersected by the Euphrates near Melitene It extends, however, much further, according to Strabo, as that geographer connects it with the great Indian range of Imaus, or Emodus, near Himalaya. He looks, indeed, upon this great chain as forming the belt of the entire Asiatic continent for the space of 4500 stadia, whilst its breadth in some parts is not less than 5000 stadia. That part of Mount Taurus which belongs to Asia Minor, is called by the Turks Sultan Dagh. To the west it is connected with the chain of lofty mountains known to the ancients by the name of Cragus, and which rises precipitously above the coast of Lycia throughout nearly the whole of its extent. To the north-east Taurus sends out one of its ramifications under the name of Anti-taurus, through Cappadocia and Armenia Minor; the highest point of this ridge was mount Argæus, its summit being covered with perpetual snow. Further north, Anti-taurus is connected with the inferior chains which traverse Paphlagonia and Pontus; such as mount Teches, Paryadres, and others, uniting afterwards with the central Armenian range of which Ararat forms the highest point, and stretching also into Colchis, where it meets the no less elevated ridge of Caucasus. Strab 11 et 12. — A mountain of Sicily.—Titus Statilius, a consul distinguished by his intimacy with Augustus, as well as by a theatre which he built, and the triumph he obtained after a prosperous campaign in Africa. He was made præfect of Italy by his imperial friend.—A pro-consul of Africa, accused by Agrippina, who wished him to be condemned, that she might become mistress of his gardens. Tacit Ann 12, 59.— An officer of Minos, king of Crete. He had an amour with Pasiphae, whence arose the fable of the Minotaur, (from the son, who was born some time after. [Vid. Minotaurus.] Taurus was vanquished by Theseus, in the games which Minos exhibited in Crete. Plut in Thes.

TAXILA (Jour) a large country in India, between the Indus and the Hydaspes. Plin. 6, 17.

TAXILUS, or TAXILES, a king of Taxila, in the age of Alexander, called also Omphis. He submitted to the conqueror, who rewarded him with great liberality. Curt. 8, 14 —A general of Mithridates, who assisted Archelaus against the Romans in Greece. He was afterwards conquered by Muræna the lieutenant of Sylla.

TAYGETE or TAYGETA, a daughter of Atlas and Pleione, mother of Lacedæmon by Jupiter. She became one of the Pleiades after death. Hygin. fab. 155 et 192.

TAYGETUS or TAYGETA, (-orum,) part of a lofty ridge of mountains, which, traversing the whole of Laconia from the Arcadian frontier, terminates in the sea at the promontory of Tænarus. It is covered with snow in some parts during the whole year, some of the ancients maintained, that from its summit the eye could comprehend the view of the whole Peloponnesus. It abounded with various kinds of beasts of the chace, and with a race of hounds much valued for their sagacity and keenness of scent. It likewise produced a beautiful green marble, much esteemed by the Romans. The principal summit, named Taletum, is now St Elias; it was dedicated to the Sun, to whom sacrifices of horses were there offered. The summit itself is now called Pente Dactylon, a name probably derived from that of Pente Lophi, by which it appears to have been once known. Strab. 8.—Plin. 37, 10.—Pomp Mem 10, 113 Hom Od. 6, 103.—Virg G. 2 488. 3, 44.—Martial. 6 42.

TEANUM APULICUM, a city of Apulia, on the right bank of the river Frento, (Fortore.) The appellation of Apulieum was added to distinguish it from the town of the Sidicini The ruins of this place occupy the site of Civitate, about a mile from the right bank of the Fortore, and ten miles from the sea. Strab 6 ——Sidicinum, the only city ascribed to the Sidicini, a Campanian tribe. It is now Teano, and was distant about fifteen miles from Capua in a north-west direction. It became a Roman colony under Augustus Strab. 5.—Plin 3, 5.

TEARUS, a river of Thrace, rising in the same rock from 35 different sources, some of which are hot, and others cold Darius raised a column there when he marched against the Scythians, as if to denote the sweetness and salubrity of the waters of that river. Herodot. 4, 90, &c.—Plin. 4, 11.

TECHES, a mountain of Pontus, from which the 10,000 Greeks had first a view of the sea. Xenoph. Anab. 4.

TECMESSA, the daughter of a Phrygian prince, called by some Teuthras, and by others Teleutas. When her father was killed in war by Ajax, son of Telamon, the young princess became the property of the conqueror, and by him she had a son called Eurysaces. Sophocles, in one of his tragedies, represents Tecmessa as moving her husband to pity by her tears and entreaties, when he wished to stab himself. Horat. Od. 2, 1, 6. – Dictys Cret. – Sophocl. in Ajac.

TECTOSAGES, or TECTOSAÆ, a people of Gallia Narbonensis. They received the name of Tectosagæ quod sagis tegerentur. Some of them passed into Germany, where they settled near the Hercynian forest, and another colony passed into Asia, where they conquered Phrygia, Paphlagonia, and Cappadocia. The Tectosagæ were among those Gauls who pillaged Rome under Brennus, and who attempted some time after to plunder the temple of Apollo at Delphi. At their return home from Greece they were visited by a pestilence, and ordered, to stop it, to throw into the river all the riches and plunder which they had obtained in their distant excursions. Cæs. B. G. 6, 23 – Cic. de Nat. D. 3. – Liv. 38, 16 – Flor. 2, 11. – Justin. 32.

TEGEA, or TEGEÆ, one of the most ancient and important cities of Arcadia. It lay in an eastern direction from the southern part of the Mænalian ridge. It was said to have been founded by Tegeus, the son of Lycaon. The gigantic bones of Orestes were found here, and removed to Sparta at the command of an oracle. It was said that a war with the inhabitants of Pheneus was prevented, by referring the decision to a combat between three brothers from each city, in which one of the Tegeatæ obtained the victory, after he had slain his antagonists, and seen his brothers killed. The story of the Horatii and Curiatii, recorded in Roman history, is probably derived from this. The beautiful Atalanta was reputed to have been a native of Tegea, which was also famed for the temple of Minerva Alea, the most splendid building of the kind in the whole Peloponnesus. The vestiges of Tegea are to be seen on the site now called Piali, about an hour east of Tripolitza, but they consist only of scattered fragments and broken tiles and stones which cover the fields. Paus. 8, 45. – Strab. 8. – Herod. 1, 65. – Xen. Hist. Gr. 6, 5, 16 &c.

TEGEUS. Vid. Teos.

TELAMON, a king of the island of Salamis, son of Æacus and Endeis. He was brother to Peleus and father to Teucer and Ajax, who on that account is often called Telamonius heros. He fled from Megara, his native country, after he had accidentally murdered his brother Phocus in playing with the quoit, and he sailed to the island of Salamis, where he soon after married Glauce, the daughter of Cychreus, the king of the place. At the death of his father in-law, who had no male issue, Telamon became king of Salamis. He accompanied Jason in his expedition to Colchis, and was arm-bearer to Hercules, when that hero took Laomedon prisoner, and destroyed Troy. Telamon was rewarded by Hercules for his services with the hand of Hesione, whom the conqueror had obtained among the spoils of Troy, and with her he returned to Greece. He also married Peribœa, whom some call Eriboea. Ovid Met. 13, 151. – Sophocl. in Aj. 570. – Apollod. 1, 9, &c. – Hygin. fab. 97, &c.

TELAMONIADES, a patronymic given to the descendants of Telamon.

TELCHINES, a people of Rhodes, said to have been originally from Crete. They were the inventors of many useful arts, and, according to Diodorus, passed for the sons of the sea. They were the first who raised statues to the gods. They had the power of changing themselves into whatever shape they pleased, and according to Ovid, they could poison and fascinate all objects with their eyes, and cause rain and hail to fall at pleasure. The Telchinians insulted Venus, for which the goddess inspired them with a sudden fury, so that they committed the grossest crimes. Jupiter destroyed them all by a deluge. Diod. 5. – Ovid Met. 7, 365, &c.

TELCHINIA, a surname of Minerva. – Also a surname of Juno in Rhodes, where she had a statue at Ialysus raised by the Telchinians who settled there. – Also an ancient name of Crete, as the place from whence the Telchines of Rhodes were descended. Stat. Silv. 4, 6, 47.

TELCHINIUS, a surname of Apollo among the Rhodians.

TELEBOE or TELEBOÆ, a people of Acarnania, called also Taphiæ. Vid. Taphius.

TELEBOIDES, islands opposite Leucadia. Vid. Taphius.

TELEGONUS, a son of Ulysses and Circe, born in the island of Ææa, where he was educated. When arrived to the years of manhood he went to Ithaca to make himself known to his father, but he was shipwrecked on the coast, and being destitute of provisions, he plundered some of the inhabitants of the island. Ulysses and Telemachus came to defend the property of their subjects against this unknown invader; a quarrel arose, and Telegonus killed his father without knowing who he was. He afterwards returned to his native country, and, according to Hyginus, he carried thither his father's body, where it was buried. Telemachus and Penelope also accompanied him in his return, and soon after the nuptials of Telegonus and Penelope were celebrated by order of Minerva. Penelope had by Telegonus a son called Italus, who gave his name to Italy. Telegonus founded Tusculum in Italy, and, according to some, he left one daughter called Mamilia, from whom the patrician family of the Mamilii at Rome were descended. Horat. od. 3, 29, 8. – Ovid Fast. 3, et 4. – Trist. 1, 1. – Plut. in Par. – Hygin. fab. 127.

TELEMACHUS, a son of Ulysses and Penelope. He was still in the cradle when his father went with the rest of the Greeks to the Trojan war. At the end of this celebrated expedition, Telemachus, anxious to see his father, went to seek him, and as the place of his residence, and the cause of his long absence, were then unknown, he visited the court of Menelaus and Nestor to obtain information. He afterwards returned to Ithaca, where the suitors of his mother Penelope had conspired to murder him, but he avoided their snares, and by means of Minerva, he discovered his father, who had arrived in the island two days before him, and was then in the house of Eumæus. With this faithful servant and Ulysses, Telemachus concerted how to deliver his mother from the importunities of her suitors, and it was effected with success. After the death of his father, Telemachus went to the island of Ææa, where he married Circe, or, according to others, Cassiphone, the daughter of Circe, by whom he had a son called Latinus. He some time after had the misfortune to kill his mother-in-law Circe, and fled to Italy, where he founded Clusium. Telemachus was accompanied in his visit to Nestor and Menelaus, by the goddess of wisdom, under the form of Mentor. It is said, that when a child, Telemachus fell into the sea, and that a dolphin brought him safe to shore, after he had remained some time under water. From this circumstance Ulysses had the figure of a dolphin engraved on the seal which he wore on his ring. Hygin. fab. 95 et 125.—Ovid Heroid. 1, 95.—Horat ep. 1, 7, 41.—Homer. Od 2, &c.

TELEPHUS, a king of Mysia, son of Hercules and Auge, the daughter of Aleus. He was exposed as soon as born on mount Parthenius, but his life was preserved by a goat and by some shepherds. According to Apollodorus, he was exposed not on a mountain, but in the temple of Minerva, at Tegea, or, according to a tradition mentioned by Pausanias, he was left to the mercy of the waves with his mother, by the cruelty of Aleus, and carried by the winds to the mouth of the Caycus, where he was found by Teuthras, king of the country, who married or rather adopted as his daughter Auge, and educated her son. Some, however, suppose that Auge fled to Teuthras to avoid the anger of her father, on account of her amour with Hercules. Yet others declare that Aleus gave her to Nauplius to be severely punished for her incontinence, and that Nauplius unwilling to injure her, sent her to Teuthras, king of Bithynia, by whom she was adopted. Telephus, according to the more received opinions, was ignorant of his origin, and he was ordered by the oracle, if he wished to know his parents, to go to Mysia. Obedient to this injunction, he came to Mysia, where Teuthras offered him his crown, and his adopted daughter Auge in marriage, if he would deliver his country from the hostilities of Idas, the son of Aphareus. Telephus readily complied, and at the head of the Mysians he soon routed the enemy, and received the promised reward as he was going to unite himself to Auge, the sudden appearance of an enormous serpent separated the two lovers; Auge implored the assistance of Hercules, and was soon informed by the god that Telephus was her own son. When his birth was known, the nuptials were not celebrated, and Telephus some time after married one of the daughters of king Priam. As one of the sons of the Trojan monarch, Telephus prepared to assist Priam against the Greeks, and with heroic valour he attacked them when they had landed on his coast. The carnage was great, and Telephus was victorious, had not Bacchus, who protected the Greeks, suddenly raised a vine from the earth, which entangled the feet of the monarch, and laid him flat on the ground. Achilles immediately rushed upon him, and wounded him so severely, that he was carried away from the battle. The wound was mortal, and Telephus was informed by the oracle, that he alone who had inflicted it could totally cure it.

Upon this, applications were made to Achilles, but in vain; the hero observed that he was no physician, till Ulysses, who knew that Troy could not be taken without the assistance of one of the sons of Hercules, and who wished to make Telephus the friend of the Greeks, persuaded Achilles to obey the directions of the oracle. Achilles consented, and as the weapon which had given the wound could alone cure it, the hero scraped the rust from the point of his spear, and, by applying it to the sore, gave it immediate relief. It is said that Telephus showed himself so grateful to the Greeks, that he accompanied them to the Trojan war, and fought with them against his father-in-law. Hygin. fab. 101. Pans. 8, 48.—Apollod. 2, 7, &c. Ælian. V. H. 12, 42.—Ovid Fast 1, 1, &c. Philostr. Her.—A rival of Horace, remarkable for his beauty and the elegance of his person. Horat. od. 1, 13.—L. Verus, wrote a book on the rhetoric of Homer, as also a comparison of that poet with Plato, and other treatises, all lost.

TELESILLA, a lyric poetess of Argos, who bravely defended her country against the Lacedæmonians, and obliged them to raise the siege. A statue was raised to her honour in the temple of Venus. Paus. 2, 20.

TELESINUS PONTIUS, a general of the Samnites, who joined the interest of Marius, and fought against the generals of Sylla. He marched towards Rome and defeated Sylla with great loss. He was afterwards routed in a bloody battle and left in the number of the slain after he had given repeated proofs of valour and courage. Plut in Mar. &c.—A poet of considerable merit in Domitian's reign. Juv. 7, 25.

TELLUS, a divinity, the same as the earth, the most ancient of all the gods after Chaos. She was mother by Cœlus of Oceanus, Hyperion, Cœus Rhea, Japetus Themis, Saturn, Phœbe, Tethys, &c. Tellus is the same as the divinity, who is honoured under the several names of Cybele, Rhea, Vesta, Ceres, Tithea, Bona Dea, Proserpine, &c. She was generally represented in the character of Tellus, as a woman with many breasts, distended with milk, to express the fecundity of the earth. She also appeared crowned with turrets, holding a sceptre in one hand, and a key in the other; while at her feet was lying a lame lion without chains, as if to intimate that every part of the earth can be made fruitful by means of cultivation. Hesiod Theog 126.—Virg Æn 7 137.—Apollod. 1, 1.—A poor man, whom Solon called happier than Croesus, the rich and ambitious king of Lydia. Tellus had the happiness to see a strong and healthy family of children, and at last honourably to fall in the defence of his country. Herod. 1, 30.

TELMESSUS, or TELMISSUS, the last city of Lycia, towards the west, and at the head of the Glaucus Sinus. Its inhabitants were famous for their skill in augury. It answers to the modern Myra or Meis. Herod 1 78.—Arrian. Exp. Alex. 2, 3.—A city of Caria, about 60 stadia to the south east of Halicarnassus, and on the Sinus Ceramicus.

TELO MARTIUS, a city and harbour on the coast of Gallia Narbonensis Secunda, now Toulon.

TELPHUSA, a city of Arcadia, forty stadia from Caus, and in a north eastern direction from Heræa. It derived its name from Telphusa, a daughter of the river Ladon. It was famed for the worship of the goddess Erinnys and Apollo Oncœus. There was a fountain here, the waters of which were so extremely cold that Tiresias was fabled to have died of drinking of them. The site of this city is supposed by Sir W. Gell to correspond with the Kalybea of Vonina, but Muller is inclined to identify it with Kutziouda. Leake, 8, 24

TEMENITES, a surname of Apollo, which he received at Temenus, a small place near Syracuse, where he was worshipped. Cic. in Verr. 4, 53.

TEMPSOS, a place of Syracuse, where Apollo, called Temenites, had a statue. Cic. in Verr. 4, 53. Steel Tab. 24.

TEMENUS, the son of Aristomachus, was the first of the Heraclidæ who returned to Peloponnesus with his brother Cresphontes, in the reign of Tisamenes, king of Argos. Temenus made himself master of the throne of Argos, from which he expelled the reigning sovereign. After death he was succeeded by his son-in law Deiphon, who had married his daughter Hyrnetho, and this succession was in preference to his own son Apollod. 2 et 7. - Paus. 2, 18, 19 —— A son of Pelasgus, who was entrusted with the care of Juno's infancy Paus 8, 22.

TEMERINDA, the Scythian name for the Palus Mæotis. Plin. 6, 7.

TEMESA, a town of the Bruttii, south-west of Terina, and near the coast. It was famed for its copper works, which are, however, referred by some to a town of the same name in Cyprus. Romanelli fixes its site at Torre del piano del Casale. Homer Od. 1, 184 - Ovid. Met. 15, 707. Fast 5, 441. Strab. 6

TEMPE, (plur. neut) a valley in Thessaly, between mount Olympus at the north, and Ossa at the south, through which the river Peneus flows into the Ægean The poets have described it as the most delightful spot on the earth, with continually cool shades and verdant walks, which the warbling of birds rendered more pleasant and romantic, and which the gods often honoured with their presence. Tempe extended about five miles in length, but varied in the dimensions of its breadth so as to be in some places scarce one acre and a half wide. All valleys that are pleasant, either for their situation or the mildness of their climate are called Tempe by the poets. Mela, 2, 3.—Dionys. Perieg. 210. —Ælian V H 3, 1. - Plut de Mus. - Virg. G 2, 469. — Ovid. Met. 1, 569

TENCTHERI, a nation of Germany, who, in conjunction with the Usipii, crossed the Rhine, were defeated by the Romans, and found protection and new settlements among the Sicambri. In their most flourishing period, the Tenchtheri dwelt in the southern part of the Duchy of Cleve, and also in that of Berg, they also took part in the confederacy of the Cheruscl. Cæs. B. G 4, 16 — Tacit Ann 13, 56 Hist 4, 21 Germ. 32.

TENEDOS, a small and fertile island of the Ægean sea, opposite Troy, at the distance of about 12 miles from Sigæum, and 56 miles north from Lesbos. It was anciently called Leucophrys, until Tenes, who had been exposed by his father in a box, was driven by the sea on the island, and having built a town, was subsequently made king. It was especially sacred to Apollo, and was the place to which the Greeks retired, in order to make the Trojans believe they had returned home without finishing the siege. The earthenware made here was held in high estimation. Hom. Od. 3, 59.— Virg. Æn. 2, 21.—Ovid. Met. 1, 540. 12, 109.— Mela, 2, 7.

TENES, a son of Cycnus and Proclea. He was exposed on the sea on the coast of Troas by his father, who credulously believed his wife Philonome, who had fallen in love with Cycnus, and accused him of attempts upon her virtue, when he refused to gratify her passion. Tenes arrived safe in Leucophrys, which he called Tenedos, and of which he became the sovereign. Some time after, Cycnus discovered the guilt of his wife Philonome, and as he wished to be reconciled to his son, whom he had so grossly injured, he went to Tenedos, but when he had tied his ship to the shore, Tenes cut off the cable with a hatchet, and suffered his father's ship to be tossed about in the sea. From this circumstance, the hatchet of Tenes is become proverbial to intimate a resentment that cannot be pacified Some however, suppose that the proverb arose from the severity of a law made by a king of Tenedos against adultery, by which the guilty were both put to death with a hatchet. The hatchet of Tenes was carefully preserved at Tenedos, and afterwards deposited by Periclytus, son of Eutymachus, in the temple of Delphi, where it was still seen in the age of Pausanias. Tenes, as some suppose, was killed by Achilles, as he defended his country against the Greeks, and he received divine honours after death. His statue at Tenedos was carried away by Verres Paus. 10, 14.

TENOS, a small island in the Ægean, near Andros, called Ophiussa and also Hyrussa, from the number of its fountains It was very mountainous, but it produced excellent wines, universally esteemed by the ancients. Tenos was about 15 miles in extent. The capital was also called Tenos Strab. 10 Mela, 2, 7. - Ovid Met. 7, 466.

TENTYRA, (plur) and TENTYRIS, a city of Egypt in the Thebaid, situate on the Nile, to the north-west of Coptos It was famous for its inhabitants destroying the crocodiles, and thus bringing themselves into collision with the people of Ombos, who paid adoration to them. Strab. 17.— Juv. Sat 15.

TEOS, or TEIOS, a city on the coast of Ionia, situated upon a peninsula south-west of Smyrna. It had been originally colonised by a part of Minyæ, from Orchomenus, led by Athamas; but it subsequently received great accession of strength from Athens at the time of the Ionian migration. When Ionia was invaded by the armies of Cyrus after the overthrow of Crœsus, the Teians, despairing of being able to resist the Persian power, abandoned their native city, and retired to Abdera in Thrace. Teos is celebrated in the literary history of Greece for having given birth to Anacreon the poet, Hecatæus the historian, and Protagoras the philosopher Though deserted by the greater part of its inhabitants, Teos still continued to subsist as an Ionian city, as may be seen from Thucydides It revolted from Athens after the Sicilian overthrow, but was again reduced. The site once occupied by this ancient city is now called Boudroun. Strab. 14.— Herod. 1, 168 3 121. - Thucyd. 3, 32. 8, 16, 19 et 20 Liv. 37, 27

TERENTIA, the wife of Cicero. She became mother of M. Cicero, and of a daughter called Tulliola. Cicero repudiated her, because she had been faithless to his bed, when he was banished in Asia. Terentia married Sallust, Cicero's enemy, and afterwards Messala Corvinus She lived to her 103d, or, according to Pliny to her 117th year. Plut in Cic.—Val. Max. 8, 13.—Cic. ad Attic. 11, 16, &c.——The wife of Scipio Africanus.——The wife of Mecænas, with whom it was said that Augustus carried on an intrigue.

TERENTIA LEX, called also CASSIA, frumentaria by M. Terentius Varro Lucullus, and C. Cassius, A. U. C. 680. It ordered that the same price should be given for all corn bought in the provinces to hinder the exactions of the quæstors.——Another by Terentius, the tribune, A. U. C. 291, to elect five persons to define the power of the consuls, lest they should abuse the public confidence by violence or rapine.

TERENTIANUS, a Roman to whom Longinus dedicated his treatise on the sublime.——Maurus, a Latin poet and grammarian, was a native of Carthage. He wrote a poem de literis, syllabis, pedibus, et metris, in which these dry topics are handled with all the art of which they are susceptible. The most recent edition of this poem is that of Santen, completed by Van Lennep, Traj. ad Rhen. 1825. It is given also in the Corpus Poetarum of Mattaire.

TERENTIUS PUBLIUS, a native of Carthage, in Africa, celebrated for the comedies which he wrote. He was sold as a slave to Terentius Lucanus, a Roman senator, who educated him with great care, and manumitted him for the brilliancy of his genius. He bore the name of his master and benefactor, and was called Terentius. He applied himself to the study of Greek comedy with uncommon assiduity, and merited the friendship and patronage of the learned and powerful Scipio, the elder Africanus, and his friend Lælius, have been suspected, on account of their intimacy, of assisting the poet in the composition of his comedies; and the fine language, the pure expressions, and delicate sentiments with which the plays of Terence abound, seem perhaps to favour the supposition. Terence was in the 25th year of his age, when his first play appeared on the Roman stage. All his compositions were received with great applause; but when the words were repeated, the plaudits were reiterated, and the audience, though composed of foreigners, conquered nations, allies, and citizens of Rome, were unanimous in applauding the poet, who spoke with such elegance and simplicity, the language of nature, and supported the native independence of man. The talents of Terence were employed rather in translation than in the effusions of originality. It is said that he translated 108 of the comedies of the poet Menander, six of which only are extant, his Andria, Eunuch, Heautontimorumenos, Adelphi, Phormio, and Hecyra. Terence is admired for the purity of his language and the artless elegance and simplicity of his diction, and for a continued delicacy of sentiment. There is more originality in Plautus, more vivacity in the intrigues, and more surprise in the catastrophes of his plays; but Terence will ever be admired for his taste, his expressions, and his faithful pictures of nature and manners, and the becoming dignity of his several characters. Quintilian, who candidly acknowledges the deficiences of the Roman comedy, declares that Terence was the most elegant and refined of all the comedians whose writings appeared on the stage. The time and the manner of his death are unknown. He left Rome in the 35th year of his age, and never after appeared there. Some suppose that he was drowned in a storm as he returned from Greece, about 159 years before Christ, though others imagine he died in Arcadia or Leucadia, and that his death was accelerated by the loss of his property, and particularly of his plays, which perished in a shipwreck. The best editions of Terence are that of Bentley, 4to. Amst. 1727; that of Westerhovius, 2 vols. 4to. Hag. Com. 1726; and that of Zeunius, 2 vols. 8vo. Lips. 1774, beautifully, but not very accurately, reprinted at the London press, in 1810, 2 vols. 8vo. There is an English translation, by Colman.——Q. Culeo, a Roman senator, taken by the Carthaginians, and redeemed by Africanus. When Africanus triumphed, Culeo followed his chariot with a pileus on his head. He was sometime after appointed judge between his deliverer and the people of Asia, and had the meanness to condemn him and his brother Asiaticus, though both innocent. Liv. 30, 45.——A consul with Æmilius Paulus at the battle of Cannæ. He was the son of a butcher, and had followed for some time the profession of his father. He placed himself totally in the power of Hannibal, by making an improper disposition of his army. After he had been defeated and his colleague slain, he retired to Canusium, with the remains of his slaughtered countrymen, and sent word to the Roman senate of his defeat. He received the thanks of this venerable body because he had engaged the enemy, however imprudently, and not despaired of the affairs of the republic. He was offered the dictatorship, which he declined. Plut.—Liv. 22 &c.

TEREUS, a king of Thrace, son of Mars and Bistonis. He married Progne, the daughter of Pandion, king of Athens, whom he had assisted in a war against Megara. He offered violence to his sister-in-law Philomela, whom he conducted to Thrace by desire of Progne. [Vid. Philomela and Progne.]——A friend of Æneas, killed by Camilla. Virg. Æn. 11, 675.

TERGESTE, a town of Venetia, in the territory of the Carni, now Trieste. It was situate at the north eastern extremity of the Sinus Tergestinus. It suffered severely, on one occasion, from a sudden incursion of the Japydes. Plin. 3, 18.—Cæs B. G. 24.—Appian. B. Illyr 18.

TERINA, a town of the Bruttii, on the coast of the Mare Tyrrhenum. It was founded by the Crotoniats, and destroyed by Hannibal. It gave name to the Sinus Terinæus. It is now St Eufemia. Plin. 3, 5.—Strab. 6.

TERIOLI, now Tyrol, a fortified town at the north of Italy, in the country of the Grisons.

TERMERUS, a robber of Peloponnesus, who killed people by crushing their head against his own. He was slain by Hercules in the same manner. Plut. in Thes.

TERMILÆ, a name given to the Lycians. Vid. Lycia.

TERMINALIA, annual festivals at Rome, observed in honour of the god Terminus, in the month of February. It was then usual for the peasants to assemble near the principal landmarks which separated their fields, and after they had crowned them with garlands and flowers, to make libations of milk and wine, and to sacrifice a lamb or a young pig. They were originally established by Numa, and though at first it was forbidden to shed the blood of victims, yet in process of time land-marks were plentifully sprinkled with it. Ovid Fast. 2, 641.—Cic. Phil. 12, 10.

TERMINĀLIS, a surname of Jupiter, because he presided over the boundaries and lands of individuals, before the worship of the god Terminus was introduced Dionys H. 2.

TERMINUS, a divinity at Rome, who was supposed to preside over bounds and limits, and to punish all unlawful usurpation of land His worship was first introduced at Rome by Numa, who persuaded his subjects that the limits of their lands and estates were under the immediate inspection of heaven. His temple was on the Tarpeian rock, and he was represented with a human head without feet or arms, to intimate that he never moved, wherever he was placed The people of the country assembled once a year with their families and crowned with garlands and flowers the stones which separated their different possessions, and offered victims to the god who presided over their boundaries It is said that when Tarquin the Proud wished to build a temple on the Tarpeian rock to Jupiter, the god Terminus refused to give way, though the other gods resigned their seats with cheerfulness; whence Ovid has said, Restitit, et magno cum Jove templa tenet.

Dionys H 2.—Ovid Fast 2, 641.—Plut in Num.—Liv 5.—Virg. Æn 9 449.

TERPANDER, a lyric poet and musician of Lesbos, 675, B C. It is said that he appeased a tumult at Sparta by the melody and sweetness of his notes He added three strings to the lyre, which before his time had only four. Ælian V. H. 12, 50 Plut de Mus.

TERPSICHORE, one of the Muses, daughter of Jupiter and Mnemosyne. She presided over dancing, of which she was reckoned the inventress, as her name intimates, and with which she delighted her sisters. She is represented like a young virgin crowned with laurel, and holding in her hand a musical instrument. Luc. 7, 35.—Apollod. 1.

TERRA, one of the most ancient deities in mythology, wife of Uranus, and mother of Oceanus, the Titans, Cyclops, Giants, Thea, Rhea, Themis, Phœbe, Thetys, and Mnemosyne By the Air she had Grief, Mourning, Oblivion, Vengeance, &c. According to Hyginus, she is the same as Tellus Vid. Tellus.

TERROR, an emotion of the mind which the ancients have made a deity, and one of the attendants of the god Mars, and of Bellona.

TERTULLIĀNUS, J. SEPTIMIUS FLORENS, a Christian writer in the second century, was born at Carthage, where his father was centurion in the army under the pro-consul of Africa. He was intended for the bar; but the constancy of the martyrs made such an impression on him, that he embraced the Christian religion, and became a priest. During the persecution in the time of Severus he published an eloquent apology for the Christians, but towards the close of life he joined the Montanists, from whom also he separated, and formed a sect of his own, which subsisted till the time of St Augustine The best edition of the entire works of Tertullian, is that of Semler, 4 vols 8vo Hal. 1770, and of his Apology, that of Haverecamp, 8vo. L. Bat. 1718.

TETHYS, the greatest of the sea deities, was wife of Oceanus, and daughter of Uranus and Terra. She was mother of the chiefest rivers of the universe, such as the Nile, the Alpheus, the Mæander Simois, Peneus, Evenus Scamander, &c and about 3000 daughters called Oceanides Tethys is confounded by some mythologists with her grand-daughter Thetis, the wife of Peleus, and the mother of Achilles The word Tethys is poetically used to express the sea Apollod 1, 1.—&c.—Virg G. 1, 31.—Ovid. Met. 2, 509, 9, 498. F st 2, 191.—Hesiod. Th 336 Homer Il 14, 302

TETRAPOLIS, a name given to the city of Antioch, (see capita) of Syria, because it was divided into four separate districts, each of which resembled a city. Some apply the word to Seleucis, which contained the four large cities of Antioch, Laodicea, Apamea, and Seleucia in Pieria.—The name of Doris in Greece, from its four cities Id. Doris.

TETRICA, a mountain of the Sabines near the river Fabaris Virg. Æn. 7, 713.

TETRICUS a Roman senator, saluted emperor in the reign of Aurelian He was led in triumph by his successful adversary, who afterwards heaped the most unbounded honours upon him and his son of the same name.

TEUCER a king of Phrygia, son of the Scamander by Idea According to some authors, he was the first who introduced among his subjects the worship of Cybele, and the dances of the Corybantes. The country where he reigned was from him called Teucria, and his subjects Teucri. His daughter Batea married Dardanus, a Samothracian prince, who succeeded him in the government of Teucria. Apollod 3, 12.—Virg Æn 3, 108. A son of Telamon, king of Salamis, by Hesione the daughter of Laomedon. He was one of Helena's suitors, and accordingly accompanied the Greeks to the Trojan war, where he signalised himself by his valour and intrepidity. It is said that his father refused to receive him into his kingdom because he had left the death of his brother Ajax unrevenged. This severity of the father did not dishearten the son, he left Salamis and retired to Cyprus where, with the assistance of Belus, king of Sidon, he built a town, which he called Salamis after his native country. He attempted to recover the island of Salamis after his father's death but his efforts were successfully opposed, and defeated by Eurysacus the son of Ajax and he retired to Cyprus, where his posterity remained seated on the throne till the time of Evagoras. He afterwards built a temple to Jupiter in Cyprus, on which a man was annually sacrificed till the reign of the Antonines. Some suppose that Teucer did not return to Cyprus, but that, according to a less received opinion, he went to settle in Spain, where new Carthage was afterwards built, and thence into Galatia. Hom. Il 1, 281.—Virg. Æn. 1, 623.—Apolod 3, 12.—Paus. 2, 29.—Justin 44, 3.—Potere. 1 1

TEUCRI, a name given to the Trojans, from Teucer, their king Virg Æn. 1, 42 et 234

TEUTA, a queen of Illyricum, B C. 231, who ordered the Roman ambassadors, P. Junius and T Coruncanius to be put to death This unprecedented murder was the cause of a war which ended in her disgrace. Flor. 2, 5. — Plin. 34, 6

TEUTAS, or TEUTATES, a name of Mercury among the Gauls. The people offered human victims to this deity. Lucan. 1, 445

TEUTHRAS, a king of Mysia on the borders of the Caycus. He adopted as his daughter, or, according to others, married, Auge the daughter of Aleus, when she fled away into Asia from her father, who wished to punish her for her amours with Hercules. Some time after, his kingdom was invaded by Idas, the son of Aphareus, and to remove this enemy, he promised Auge and his crown to any one who could restore tranquillity to his subjects. This was executed by Telephus, who afterwards proved to be the son of Auge, who was promised in marriage to him by right of his successful expedition. Some authors call Teuthras the father of Thespius, and thence the fifty Thespiades, who became mothers by Hercules, are called Teuthrantiades. — Apollod. 2, 7, &c. — Paus. 3, 25 — Ovid Trist. 2, 19 — Herod. 9, 51. — Hygin. fab 100 — One of the companions of Æneas in Italy. Virg. Æn. 10, 402

TEUTOBURGIENSIS SALTUS, a forest of Germany, lying in an eastern direction from Paderborn, and reaching as far as the territory of Osnabruck. It was here that Varus, with three Roman legions, was completely routed by the Cherusci under Arminius, A. D. 10. — Tacit. Ann. 1, 60.

TEUTONI and TEUTONES, a name given to several united tribes of Germany, who with the Cimbri made incursions upon Gaul, and cut to pieces two Roman armies. They were at last defeated by the consul Marius, and an infinite number made prisoners. [Vid Cimbri.] Cic. pro Manil. — Flor. 3, 3. — Plut. in Mar. — Martial 14, 26.

THAIS, a famous courtezan of Athens, who accompanied Alexander in his Asiatic conquests, and gained such an ascendancy over him, that she made him burn the royal palace of Persepolis. After Alexander's death, she married Ptolemy king of Egypt. Menander celebrated her charms, both mental and personal, which were of a superior nature, and on this account she is called Menandrea by Propertius, 2, 6. — Ovid de Art Am. 3, 604. de Rem. Am. 384. — Plut in Alex. Juv. 3, 93

THALA, a town of Africa, in the dominions of Jugurtha. It is now Feriane. Tac. Ann. 3, 21.

THALASSIUS, a beautiful young Roman in the reign of Romulus. At the rape of the Sabines, one of these virgins appeared remarkable for her beauty and elegance, and her ravisher, afraid of many competitors, exclaimed as he carried her away, that it was for Thalassius. The name of Thalassius was no sooner mentioned, than all were eager to preserve so beautiful a prize for him. Their union was attended with so much happiness, that it was ever after usual at Rome to make use of the word Thalassius at nuptials, and to wish those that were married the felicity of Thalassius. He is supposed by some to be the same as Hymen, as he was made a deity. Plut. in Rom. — Martial. 3, 92. — Liv. 1, 9.

THALES, one of the seven wise men, and founder of the Ionic sect of philosophers, was born at Miletus, B.C. 586. He travelled into Egypt, and while there obtained favour from the king Amasis, till he offended him by the freedom of his remarks. Thales then returned to Greece, where he had Anaximander, Anaximenes, and Pythagoras, for his disciples. He taught, that water is the principle of all things, and that the universe is the work of an Infinite Being. He made discoveries in geometry, particularly in triangles, and when in Egypt, he took the heights of the pyramids by the shadow. He was also an excellent astronomer, and divided the sphere into zones arctic and antarctic circles, the two tropics and equator. He observed the apparent diameter of the sun, and calculated eclipses. He died at the age of 96, at the Olympic games. Herodot 1, 7. — Diog. 1.

Cic. de Nat. D. &c. — A lyric poet of Crete, intimate with Lycurgus. He prepared by his rhapsodies the minds of the Spartans to receive the rigorous institutions of his friend, and inculcated a reverence for the peace of civil society.

THALESTRIA, or THALESTRIS, a queen of the Amazons, who, accompanied by 300 women, came 30 days' journey to meet Alexander, in his Asiatic conquests, to raise children by a man whose fame was so great, and courage so uncommon. Curt. 6, 5. Justin 2, 4.

THALIA, one of the Muses, who presided over festivals, and over pastoral and comic poetry. She is represented leaning on a column, holding a mask in her right hand, by which she is distinguished from her sisters, as also by a shepherd's crook. Her dress appears shorter and not so ornamented as that of the other Muses. Horat. Od. 4, 6, 25. — Mart. 9, 75. — Plut. in Symp. &c. — Virg. Ec. 6, 2. — One of the Nereides. Hesiod Th. — Virg. Æn. 5, 826

THAMYRAS, or THAMYRIS, a celebrated musician of Thrace. His father's name was Philammon, and his mother's Argiope. He became enamoured of the Muses, and challenged them to a trial of skill. His challenge was accepted, and it was mutually agreed that the conquered should be totally at the disposal of his victorious adversary. He was conquered; and the Muses deprived him of his eye sight and his melodious voice, and broke his lyre. His poetical compositions are lost. Hom. Il. 2, 594, 5, 599. — Apollod. 1, 3. Ovid. Amor. 3, 7, 62. Art Am. 3, 399. — Paus. 4, 33.

THAPSACUS, a city on the western bank of the Euphrates, nearly opposite to the modern Rocca. There was a great ford of the Euphrates here which is celebrated in history by the crossing of three great armies first, by Cyrus, in his expedition against Artaxerxes B.C. 401; subsequently by Darius, when defeated at Issus B.C. 333; and three years afterwards by Alexander in pursuit of him, previous to the decisive battle of Arbella. Xen. Anab. 1, 4. — Arrian 2, 13. 3, 7. — Strab 16.

THAPSUS, now Demass, a town of Africa Propria, on the coast, south-east of Hadrumetum, famous for the victory obtained there by Cæsar over Juba and Metellius Scipio, the latter of whom had fled hither with the wreck of Pompey's party after the fatal battle of Pharsalia. Bel. Ital. 3, 261. — Liv. 29, 30. 33, 48 — A town of Sicily, on the eastern coast, not far to the north of Syracuse.

THARGELIA, festivals in Greece, in honour of Apollo and Diana. They lasted two days, and the youngest of both sexes carried olive-branches, on which were suspended cakes and fruits.

THABIUS, or THRASIUS, a famous soothsayer of Cyprus, who told Busiris, king of Egypt, that to stop a dreadful plague which afflicted his country, he must offer a foreigner to Jupiter. Upon this the tyrant ordered him to be seized and sacrificed to the god, as he was not a native of Egypt. Ovid. de Art Am. 1, 649.—A surname of Hercules, who was worshipped at Thasos.

THASOS, now Thaso, an island in the Ægean, off the coast of Thrace, and opposite the mouth of the Nestus. It was also called Æria and Chryse. It is about 40 miles in circumference, and was remarkable for its fertility, its mines of gold and silver, as well as for its beautiful wine and marble. The Phœnicians first colonised it, but some Parians afterwards settled there at the command of an oracle. It received the name of Thasos from the son of Agenor, who is said to have retired hither when despairing to find his sister Europa. Its chief town was Thasos. Herod. 6, 47.—Plin. 4, 12, 26, 6.—Strab. Lp. 6.—Dionys. Perieg. 533.—Virg. G. 2, 91.

THASUS, a son of Neptune, who went with Cadmus to seek Europa. He built the town of Thasos in Thrace. Some make him brother of Cadmus. Apollod. 3, 1.

THAUMACI, now Thaumaco, a city of Thessaly, in the district of Pthiotis, and in a north-west direction from the head waters of the Sinus Maliacus. It is said to have derived its name from the singularity of its situation, and the astonishment (θαῦμα) produced upon the minds of travellers upon first reaching it. Liv. 32, 4, 36, 15.

THAUMANTIAS, and THAUMANTIS, a name given to Iris, the messenger of Juno, because she was the daughter of Thaumas, the son of Oceanus and Terra, by one of the Oceanides. Hesiod. Th. Virg. Æn. 9, 5.—Ovid. Met. 4, 479, 14, 845.

THEAGENES, an athlete of Thasos, famous for his strength. His father's name was Timosthenes, a friend of Hercules. He was crowned above a thousand times at the public games of the Greeks, and became a god after death. Paus. 6, 6 et 11.—Plut.—A Theban officer, who distinguished himself at the battle of Cheronæa. Plut.—A writer who published commentaries on Homer's works.

THEANO, the wife of Metapontus, son of Sisyphus, presented some twins to her husband, when he wished to repudiate her for her barrenness. The children were educated with the greatest care, and some time afterwards, Theano herself became mother of twins. When they were grown up, she encouraged them to murder the supposititious children who were to succeed to their father's throne, in preference to them. They were both killed in the attempt, and the father, displeased with the conduct of Theano, repudiated her to marry the mother of the children whom he had long considered as his own. Hygin. Fab. 186. A daughter of Cisseus, sister to Hecuba, who married Antenor, and was supposed to have betrayed the Palladium to the Greeks as she was priestess of Minerva. Homer. Il. 6, 298.—Paus. 10, 27.—Dictys Cret. 5, 8.—One of the Danaides. Her husband's name was Phantes. Apollod. 2, 1.—The wife of the philosopher, Pythagoras, daughter of Pythanax of Creta, or, according to others, of Brontinus of Croto. Diog. 8, 42.—The daughter of Pythagoras.—A poetess of Locris.—A priestess of Athens, daughter of Menon, who refused to pronounce a curse upon Alcibiades, when he was accused of having mutilated all the statues of Mercury. Paus.—The mother of Pausanias. She was the first, as it is reported, who brought a stone to the entrance of Minerva's temple to shut up her son, when she heard of his crimes and perfidy to his country. Polyæn. 8.—A Trojan matron, who became mother of Mimas by Amycus, the same night that Paris was born. Virg. Æn. 10, 703.

THEBÆ (Thebæ), one of the most ancient and celebrated of the Grecian cities, the capital of Bœotia, situated near the river Ismenus, and in a north-eastern direction from Platæa. It was founded by Cadmus, who called it Cadmea, an appellation which was subsequently confined to the citadel only, but he afterwards gave it the name of Thebes, from the great Egyptian city. It was originally without walls, but Amphion and Zethus built them by the sound of the lyre, from its seven gates, it is surnamed Heptapylos. Eteocles and Polynices, the two sons of Œdipus, king of Thebes, inherited their father's throne, and mutually agreed that they should reign each a year alternately. Eteocles ascended the throne first, by right of seniority, but when the year was expired, he refused to resign the crown to his brother. Upon this, Polynices fled to Argos, to implore the assistance of the Argives, and there married Argia, the daughter of Adrastus, king of the country, and levied a large army, at the head of which he marched against Thebes. The command of this army was divided amongst seven celebrated chiefs, who were to attack the seven gates of the city. The battle, however, was decided by single combat between the two brothers, who both killed one another. Epaminondas, under whom the Thebans rose to the highest reputation, was the great ornament of their city. Pelopidas, the famous Theban general was born here, as was also Pindar. Alexander, the son of Philip, proved the ruin of the city by razing it to the ground, in revenge for the inhabitants revolting against him; but he spared the house and family of Pindar, from admiration of the poet. Apollod. 2, 4, &c.—Mela, 2, 3.—Paus. 2, 6, 9, 5.—Strab. 9.—Plut. in *Pel. In a military point of view its importance was great, as it commanded the avenues of Magnesia and Thessaly, from its vicinity to Demetrias Pheræ and Pharsalus. Polyb. 5, 99, &c.—Liv. 33, 5, 32, 25.—A celebrated city of Upper Egypt, the capital of Thebais. It was built at so remote a period, that the Egyptians reckoned it the most ancient city in the world. Thebes is mentioned in Holy Writ by the name of No and Ammon No, and it was called by the Greeks Diospolis Magna or the Great City of Jove, from its being sacred to the father of the gods. It had obtained a great importance in a very early age, as may be conjectured from its being mentioned by Homer, who describes it as having a hundred gates, whence it was surnamed Hecatompylos, from each of which it could pour forth 200 armed men. It was forty miles in circumference and was surrounded by a wall 24 feet thick. It was the first residence of the kings of Egypt who were buried in magnificent sepulchres hewn out of the Lybian mountains on the western side of the Nile; their great palace was also on the same bank of the river, in a part of the city named Memnonium after the famous Memnon. In the times of the Greeks and Romans the appellation Diospolis was entirely confined to that part of Thebes which lay east of the Nile, the remainder being known by its old title of Memnonium. After its destruction by Cambyses, Thebes never rose to its former grandeur and importance, the subsequent kings having taken up their residence at Memphis. Its site is now occupied by several villages, as Carnac, Luxor, Medina, Thabu, &c. the last of which appears still to preserve some vestiges of the ancient name. Pun. 5, 9.—Jun. 15, 15. *Luc. THEBAIS, a country in the southern parts of Egypt of which Thebes was the capital.—— There have been some poems which have borne the name of Thebais but of these the only one extant is the Thebais of Statius. Ind. Statius.

THEBE, a city of Mysia, north of Adramyttium, and surnamed Hypoplacia from being situated under a hill called Placos. It was the birth-place of Andromache, and was taken by Achilles during the Trojan war. Hom. Il. 6, 397.—Liv. 37, 19.——The wife of Alexander, tyrant of Pheræ. She was persuaded by Pelopidas to murder her husband.

THELXIÓPE, one of the Muses, according to some writers. Cic. de Fin. 3, 21.

THEMIS, a daughter of Cœlus and Terra, who married Jupiter against her own inclination. She became mother of Dice, Irene, Eunomia, the Parcæ and Horæ; and was the first to whom the inhabitants of the earth raised temples. Her oracle was famous in Attica in the age of Deucalion, who consulted it with great solemnity, and was instructed how to repair the loss of mankind. She was generally attended by the seasons. Among the moderns she is represented as holding a sword in one hand, and a pair of scales in the other. Ovid. Met. 1, 321.——A daughter of Ilus, who married Capys and became mother of Anchises. Apollod. 3, 12.

THEMISCÝRA, a city of Pontus, capital of a district of the same name. The town of Themiscyra appears to have been one of very early origin. Scylax mentions it as a Grecian state; Herodotus also speaks of it; and Appian reports that it was besieged by Lucullus after the retreat of Mithridates from Cyzicus. The Themiscyrians defended themselves with vigour, and when their walls were undermined, they sent bears, and other wild beasts, and even swarms of bees, against the workmen of the enemy. Scylax, p. 33.—Herod. 4, 86.—Appian Mithr. 78.

THEMISON, a famous physician of Laodicea, disciple to Asclepiades. He was founder of a sect called Methodists, because he wished to introduce methods to facilitate the learning and the practice of physic. He flourished in the Augustan age. Plin. 29, 1.—Juv. 10, 221.—— One of the generals of Antiochus the Great. He was born at Cyprus. Ælian V. H. 2, 41.

THEMISTA, or THEMISTIS, a goddess, the same as Themis.

THEMISTIUS, a Greek orator and philosopher, who, for his eloquence, was called Euphrades. He flourished in the fourth century, at Constantinople, where Constantius elected him into the senate, and ordered a statue to be set up in honour of him in 301. Succeeding emperors showed him equal respect; and Theodosius made him prefect of the city. Though Themistius was a heathen, he kept up a correspondence with the Christians, particularly Gregory of Nazianzus. His orations have been published by Hardouin. Themistius also wrote commentaries on the works of Aristotle.

THEMISTO, a daughter of Hypseus, was the third wife of Athamas, king of Thebes, by whom she had four sons, called Prous, Leucon, Schœneus, and Erythroes. She endeavoured to kill the children of Ino, her husband's second wife, but she killed her own by means of Ino, who lived in her house in the disguise of a servant-maid, and to whom she entrusted her bloody intentions, upon which she destroyed herself. Paus. 9, 23. Apollod. 1, 9.——The mother of the poet Homer, according to a tradition mentioned by Pausanias, 10, 24.

THEMISTÓCLES, a celebrated general, born at Athens. His father's name was Neocles, and his mother's Euterpe, or Abrotonum, a native of Halicarnassus, or of Thrace, or Acarnania. The beginning of his youth was marked by vices so flagrant, and an inclination so incorrigible, that his father disinherited him. This, which might have disheartened others, roused the ambition of Themistocles, and the protection which he was denied at home, he sought in courting the favours of the populace, and in sharing the administration of public affairs. When Xerxes invaded Greece, Themistocles was at the head of the Athenian republic, and in this capacity the fleet was entrusted to his care. While the Lacedæmonians under Leonidas were opposing the Persians at Thermopylæ, the naval operations of Themistocles, and the combined fleet of the Peloponnesians were directed to destroy the armament of Xerxes, and to ruin his maritime power. The obstinate wish of the generals to command the Grecian fleet, might have proved fatal to the interests of the allies, had not Themistocles freely relinquished his pretensions, and by nominating his rival Eurybiades master of the expedition, shown the world that his ambition could stoop when his country demanded his assistance. The Persian fleet was distressed at Artemisium by a violent storm, and the feeble attack of the Greeks; but a decisive battle had never been fought, if Themistocles had not used threats and entreaties, and even called religion to his aid, and the favourable answers of the oracle, to second his measures. The Greeks, actuated by different views, were unwilling to make head by sea against an enemy whom they saw victorious by land, plundering their cities, and destroying all by fire and sword; but before they were dispersed Themistocles sent intelligence of their intentions to the Persian monarch. Xerxes, by immediately blocking them with his fleet, in the bay of Salamis, prevented their escape, and while he wished to crush them all at one blow, he obliged them to fight for their safety, as well as for the honour of their country. This battle, which was fought near the island of Salamis, B.C. 480, was decisive, the Greeks obtained the victory, and Themistocles the honour of having destroyed the formidable navy of Xerxes. Further to ensure the peace of his country, Themistocles informed the Asiatic monarch, that the Greeks had conspired to cut the bridge which he had built across the Hellespont, and to prevent his retreat into Asia. This met with equal success. Xerxes hastened away from Greece, and while he believed, on the words of Themistocles, that his return would be disputed, he left his forces without a general, and his fleets an easy conquest to the victorious Greeks. These signal services to his country, endeared Themistocles to the Athenians, and he was universally called the most warlike and most courageous of all the Greeks who fought against the Persians. He was received with the most distinguished honours, and, by his prudent administration, Athens was soon fortified with strong walls, her Piræus was rebuilt, and her harbours were filled with a numerous and powerful navy, which rendered her the mistress of Greece. Yet in the midst of that glory the conqueror of Xerxes incurred the displeasure of his countrymen, which had proved so fatal to many of his illustrious predecessors. He was banished from the city, and after he had sought in vain a safe retreat among the republics of Greece, and the barbarians of Thrace, he threw himself into the arms of a monarch, whose fleets he had defeated, and whose father he had ruined. Artaxerxes, the successor of Xerxes, received the illustrious Athenian with kindness, and though he had formerly set a price upon his head, yet he made him one of his greatest favourites, and bestowed three rich cities upon him, to provide him with bread, wine, and meat. Such kindnesses from a monarch, from whom he, perhaps, expected the most hostile treatment, did not alter the sentiments of Themistocles. He still remembered that Athens gave him birth, and according to some writers, the wish of not injuring his country, and therefore his inability of carrying on war against Greece, at the request of Artaxerxes obliged him to destroy himself by drinking bull's blood. The manner of his death, however, is uncertain, and while some affirm that he poisoned himself, others declare that he fell a prey to a violent distemper in the city of Magnesia, where he had fixed his residence while in the dominions of the Persian monarch. His bones were conveyed to Attica and honoured with a magnificent tomb by the Athenians, who began to repent too late of their cruelty to the saviour of his country. Themistocles died in the 65th year of his age, about 449 years before the Christian era. He has been admired as a man naturally courageous, of a disposition fond of activity, ambitious of glory and enterprise. Blessed with a provident and discerning mind, he seemed to rise superior to misfortunes, and in the midst of adversity, was possessed of resources which could enable him to regain his splendour, and even to command fortune. Plut. et C. Nep. in Vita.—Paus. 1. 1. 8. 52.—Athen. 5. 6. 2. 12. 3. 13. 40.——A writer, some of whose letters are extant. The best edition is that of Bremer, 8vo. Lips. 1779.

THEOCLYMENUS a soothsayer of Argolis, descended from Melampus. His father's name was Thestor. He foretold the speedy return of Ulysses to Penelope and Telemachus. Homer. Od. 15, 225, &c.—Hygin fab 128.

THEOCRITUS, a Greek poet, a native of Syracuse, who flourished in the time of Ptolemy Philadelphus, and in the reign of the second Hiero, B.C. 270. He was instructed, in his early education, by Asclepiades of Samos, and Philetas of Cos; subsequently he became the friend of Aratus, and passed a part of his days at Alexandria, and the remainder in Sicily. It has been supposed that he was strangled by order of Hiero, king of Sicily, in revenge for some satirical invectives, but the passage of Ovid on which the supposition rests, mentions only "the Syracusan poet," and it does not follow that this was our bard. The compositions of Theocritus bear the name of Idylia (Εἰδύλλια) by which word is meant not one particular class of subjects, but miscellaneous or occasional pieces of various but moderate lengths. They are all written in the Doric dialect, yet few of them are properly pastorals, though the greater part refer to country life and manners. The purely pastoral may still be placed at the head of that species of composition, from the truth, and simplicity of the manners, sometimes, indeed, deviating to coarseness, and the pleasing descriptions of natural objects, evidently drawn from the life. In these respects Theocritus greatly excels his imitators, and his poetry in general is highly agreeable to all who have a taste for genuine simplicity and the beauties of nature. The most esteemed editions of Theocritus are that of Wheatan, 2 vols. 4to Oxon. 1770, that of Valckenaer, 8vo. L. Bat. 1781, that of Gaisford, in the Poetæ Minores, 4 vols. 8vo. Oxon 1816 20; and that of Kiessling, 8vo Lip. 1819. Polwhele has translated this author into English verse with notes.

THEODAMAS, or THIODAMAS, a king of Mysia, in Asia Minor. He was killed by Hercules, because he refused to treat him and his son Hellus with hospitality. Ovid in Ib. 438.—Apollod. 2. 7.—Hygin fab 271.

THEODICTES, a Greek orator and poet of Phaselis in Pamphylia, son of Aristander and disciple of Isocrates. He wrote 50 tragedies besides other works now lost. He had such a happy memory that he could repeat with ease whatever verses were spoken in his presence. When Alexander passed through Phaselis, he crowned with garlands the statue which had been erected to the memory of the poet. Cic. Tusc. 1. 2. In Orat. 51. &c.—Plut. Quæst.

THEODORA, a daughter-in-law of the emperor Maximian, who married Constantius.——A daughter of Constantine.——A woman who, from being a prostitute, became empress to Justinian, and distinguished herself by her intrigues and enterprises.——The name of Theodora is common to the empresses of the east in a later period.

THEODORETUS, one of the Greek fathers, was born at Antioch about A.D. 386. He was a disciple of Chrysostom. In 420 he was made bishop of Cyrrhus, in Syria, where he laboured assiduously in converting a rude people, and opposing the errors of Nestorius. He died about 460. He is the author of a history commencing in 323, where that of Eusebius ends, and terminating in 428. The best edition is that of Reading, fol. Cantab. 1720.

THEODORUS, a Syracusan of great authority among his countrymen, who severely inveighed against the tyranny of Dionysius.——A philosopher, disciple to Aristippus. He denied the existence of a God He was banished from Cyrene, and fled to Athens, where the friendship of Demetrius Phalereus saved him from the accusations which were carried to the Areopagus against him Some suppose that he was at last condemned to death for his impiety, and that he drank poison ——A preceptor to one of the sons of Antony, whom he betrayed to Augustus.——A consul in the reign of Honorius. Claudian wrote a poem upon him, in which he praises him with great liberality ——A secretary of Valens. He conspired against the emperor and was beheaded ——A Greek poet of Colophon, whose compositions are lost.—— A Greek poet in the age of Cleopatra He wrote a book of metamorphoses, which Ovid imitated as some suppose.

THEODOSIA, a town on the south east side of the Tauric Chersonese, called also Capha, now Caffa. Mela, 2, 1.

THEODOSIOPOLIS a town of Armenia, built by Theodosius, &c It is now called Hassan-Calch ——Another in Mesopotamia on the river Chaboras. Its previous name was Resaina, and it was founded by a colony in the reign of Septimius Severus Vid Resaina.

THEODOSIUS, FLAVIUS a Roman emperor surnamed Magnus from the greatness of his exploits. He was invested with the imperial purple by Gratian, and appointed over Thrace and the eastern provinces, which had been in the possession of Valentinian The first years of his reign were marked by different conquests over the barbarians. The Goths were defeated in Thrace, and 3000 of their chariots, with an immense number of prisoners of both sexes, were the reward of the victory. This glorious campaign intimidated the inveterate enemies of Rome, they sued for peace, and treaties of alliance were made with distant nations, who wished to gain the favours and the friendship of a prince whose military virtues were so conspicuous. Some conspiracies were formed against the emperor, but Theodosius totally disregarded them, and while he punished his competitors for the imperial purple, he thought himself sufficiently secure in the love and the affection of his subjects His reception at Rome was that of a conqueror; he triumphed over the barbarians, and restored peace in every part of the empire. He died of a dropsy at Milan, in the 60th year of his age, after a reign of 16 years, the 17th of January A. D. 395 His body was conveyed to Constantinople, and buried by his son Arcadius, in the tomb of Constantine. Theodosius was the last of the emperors who was the sole master of the whole Roman empire. He left three children, Arcadius and Honorius, who succeeded him, and Pulcheria. Theodosius has been commended by ancient writers as a prince blessed with every virtue, and debased by no vicious propensity Though master of the world he was a stranger to that pride and arrogance which too often disgrace the monarch, he was affable in his behaviour, benevolent and compassionate, and it was his wish to treat his subjects as himself was treated when a private man, and a dependant. Men of merit were promoted to places of trust and honour, and the emperor was fond of patronising the cause of virtue and learning His zeal as a follower of Christianity has been applauded by all the ecclesiastical writers, and it was the wish of Theodosius to support the revealed religion, as much by his example, meekness, and Christian charity, as by his edicts and ecclesiastical institutions. His want of clemency, however, in one instance, was too openly betrayed, and when the people of Thessalonica had unmeaningly, perhaps, killed one of his officers, the emperor ordered his soldiers to put all the inhabitants to the sword, and no less than 6000 persons without distinction of rank, age, or sex, were cruelly butchered in that town in the space of three hours. This violence irritated the ecclesiastics, and Theodosius was compelled by St Ambrose to do open penance in the church, and publicly to make abatement for an act of barbarity which had excluded him from the bosom of the church and the communion of the faithful. In his private character Theodosius was an example of sobriety and temperance, his palace displayed becoming grandeur, but still with moderation He never indulged luxury, or countenanced superfluities He was fond of bodily exercise, and never gave himself up to pleasure and enervating enjoyments. The laws and regulations which he introduced in the Roman empire, were of the most salutary nature Socrat. 5, &c. Zosim. 4 &c.—Ambros.—Augustin. Claudian &c ——The 2d, succeeded his father Arcadius as emperor of the western Roman empire, though only in the eighth year of his age He was governed by his sister Pulcheria, and by his ministers and eunuchs, in whose hands was the disposal of the offices of state, and all places of trust and honour. He married Eudoxia, the daughter of a philosopher called Leontius, a woman remarkable for her virtues and piety The territories of Theodosius were invaded by the Persians, but the emperor soon appeared at the head of a numerous force, and the two hostile armies met on the frontiers of the empire. The consternation was universal on both sides; without even a battle, the Persians fled, and no less than 100,000 were lost in the waters of the Euphrates. Theodosius raised the siege of Nisibis, where his operations failed of success, and he averted the fury of the Huns and Vandals by bribes and promises. He died on the 29th of July, in the 49th year of his age, A D. 450, leaving only one daughter, Licinia Eudoxia, whom he married to the emperor Valentinian 3d. The carelessness and inattention of Theodosius to public affairs are well known. He signed all the papers that were brought to him without even opening them or reading them, till his sister apprized him of his negligence, and rendered him more careful and diligent, by making him sign a paper, in which he delivered into her hands Eudoxia his wife as a slave and menial servant The laws and regulations which were promulgated under him, and selected from the most useful and salutary institutions of his imperial predecessors, have been called the Theodosian code. Theodosius was a warm advocate for the Christian religion, but he has been blamed for his partial attachment to those who opposed the orthodox faith. Sozom.—Socrates, &c.——A mathematician of Tripolis, in Lydia, who flourished probably under the emperor Trajan, about A. D. 100. He wrote three books on the sphere, which were translated from the Greek into Arabic, and from thence into Latin. The best edition is that of Hunt, 8vo. Oxon. 1767.——A Roman general, father of Theodosius the Great; he died A. D. 376.

THEODOTUS, an admiral of the Rhodians, sent by his countrymen to make a treaty with the Romans.——A native of Chios, who, as preceptor and counsellor of Ptolemy, advised the feeble monarch to murder Pompey. He carried the head of the unfortunate Roman to Cæsar, but the resentment of the conqueror was such that the mean assassin fled, and, after a wandering and miserable life in the cities of Asia, he was at last put to death by Brutus. Plut. in Brut. et Pomp.——A governor of Bactriana, in the age of Antiochus, who revolted and made himself king, B. C. 250.——A friend of the emperor Julian.

THEOGNIS, a Greek poet, was a native of Megara in Greece, and flourished about B. C. 546. There remain of his poetry 1248 verses, belonging to the class of γνῶμαι (sententiæ) or maxims. They are simple verses or couplets, once, probably, forming parts of connected poems; two poems, particularly, are said to have been composed by him. The portions extant are valued for their moral, rather than their poetical character. Theognis is said to have died B.C. 494. His verses are addressed, under the name of παραινέσεις, exhortations, chiefly to a young man to whom he gives counsel on the conduct of life. He has been reproached for the licentious nature of some of his sentiments, yet nothing of this character appears in the fragments extant. He inculcates religious and filial duty, and recommends caution in the choice of friends. It is not improbable, that some of the verses ascribed to Theognis are of later origin, although most of them are thought to be evidently of high antiquity. In 1815, or near that time, 159 verses, never printed, were discovered by Bekker, in a Modena manuscript. These added make the whole number extant about 1400. The best edition of Theognis is that of Bekker, 8vo. Lips. 1815.

THEOMNESTUS, a rival of Nicias in the administration of public affairs at Athens.——An Athenian philosopher, among the followers of Plato's doctrines. He had Brutus Cæsar's murderer, among his pupils.

THEOPHANE, a daughter of Bisaltus, whom Neptune changed into a sheep, to remove her from her numerous suitors, and conveyed to the island Crumissa. The god afterwards assumed the shape of a ram, and under this transformation he had by the nymph a ram with a golden fleece, which carried Phrixus to Colchis. Ovid Met. 6, 177.—Hygin. fab. 188.

THEOPHANES, a Greek historian, born at Mitylene. He was very intimate with Pompey, and from his friendship with the Roman general, his countrymen derived many advantages. After the battle of Pharsalia he advised Pompey to retire to the court of Egypt. Cic. pro Arch. &c.—Patterc. 2, 18.—Plut. in Cic et Pomp.——His son, M. Pompeius Theophanes, was made governor of Asia, and enjoyed the intimacy of Tiberius.——A native of Constantinople, known as an historian, and as an ecclesiastic at the seventh general council. He was banished into Samathrace by the jealousy of Leo the Armenian, and died there in 818. He is author of a chronicle, extending from the period where Syncellus finishes, to the reign of Michael Curopalata, of which the best edition is that of the Louvre, 1655, folio.

THEOPHANIA, festivals celebrated at Delphi in honour of Apollo.

THEOPHILUS, a governor of Syria in the age of Julian.——A friend of Pliny.——A physician, whose treatise de Urinis is best edited by Guidonius, L. Bat. 1728. The best edition of another work of his, de fabrica hominis, is that by Morell, 8vo. Paris, 1556. Theophilus flourished under Heraclius, about A. D. 630.——A bishop of Antioch, ordained to that see in 168 or 170, A. D. He opposed the heretics with great vigour, and wrote several books which are lost, except three in defence of the Christian religion, addressed to a learned heathen named Autolycus. They were published by Conrad Gesner, at Zurich, in 1546. Theophilus is said to have been the first who made use of the word Trinity to express the three persons in the Godhead.—— The name of Theophilus is common among the primitive Christians.

THEOPHRASTUS, a Greek philosopher, was born B. C. 371, at Eresus, a maritime town of the island of Lesbos. After an education in the rudiments of learning in his own country, his father, who is said to have been a fuller, sent him to Athens, where he became a disciple first of Plato, and then of Aristotle. Under these eminent masters he made so great a progress in philosophy, which he adorned with eloquence and every liberal accomplishment, that when Aristotle withdrew to Calcis, he nominated Theophrastus his successor in the Peripatetic school. In this office, which he undertook B. C. 323, he acquired so high a reputation that he is said to have been attended by 2000 scholars, among whom are found the names of Nicomachus the son of Aristotle, Erasistratus the celebrated physician, Demetrius Phalereus, and Menander. His fame extended to foreign countries, and he received an invitation to Egypt from Ptolemy, and to Macedon from Cassander. He deserved well of his country, which he is said twice to have freed from the domination of tyrants. He was so great a favourite with the Athenians, that when he was accused by one of his enemies of teaching impious doctrines, the accuser himself narrowly escaped the punishment which he proposed to inflict on Theophrastus. He contributed liberally towards the expense attending the public meetings of the philosophers; and he consulted the dignity of his profession by appearing in the schools in an elegant dress, and being very attentive to the graces of elocution. For this last quality he was so conspicuous, that Aristotle, it is said, changed his original name of Tyrtamus, first to Euphrastus, the fine speaker, and then to Theophrastus, the divine speaker. Towards the close of his life he grew so infirm, that he was carried to the school on a couch. He reached, however, the age of 85, yet complained of the shortness of human life; observing that nature had granted longevity to stags and crows, to whom it is of little value, but had denied it to man, who, when just arrived within sight of the summit of science, was carried off without being allowed to attain it. Theophrastus wrote many valuable works, some of which have come down to us. His ethical pieces, styled Ἤθικοι Χαρακτῆρες, Mor. Character., possess great worth, being written with brevity and eloquence, and stamped with truth and evincing much knowledge of human nature. They have the appearance however, of being merely extracts from the moral writings of Theophrastus, made subsequently to his times. We have also, under the name of Theophrastus, a Book of Metaphysics, and a treatise περὶ αἰσθήσεως, On Perception. Of the numerous works on natural history written by Theophrastus, the following alone remain: περὶ φυτῶν ἱστορίας, History of Pl nts, in 10 books; περὶ φυτικῶν αἰτιῶν, On the Causes of Pl nts, in 10 books, of which only 6 have come down to us; περὶ λίθων, Of Stones. We have also from him several other treatises on Winds, Fire, Odours &c. and various fragments preserved in Photius. The best edition of the works of Theophrastus is that of Schneider, 5 vols. 8vo Lips 1818. The treatise on stones has been translated into English by J Hill, and is accompanied by very useful notes, 8vo Lond 1777. The best editions of the "Characters" are, that of Casaubon, 8vo. L. Bat. 1592, that of Fischer, 8vo. Coburg, 1763, and that of Ast, 8vo. Lips. 1816.

THEOPHYLACTUS, SIMOCATTA, a Byzantine historian. He wrote in eight books the history of the reign of the emperor Maurice, ending with the massacre of this prince and his children by Phocas. This work was printed at Paris, in 1647, folio.—One of the Greek fathers, who flourished A D. 1070. His works were edited at Venice 4 vols 1754 to 1763.

THEOPOLIS, a name given to Antioch, because there Christians first received their name there.

THEOPOMPUS, a king of Sparta, of the family of the Proclidæ who succeeded his father Nicander, and distinguished himself by the many new regulations which he introduced. He created the Ephori and died, after a long and peaceful reign, B C 723. While he sat on the throne, the Spartans made war against Messenia. Plut. in Lyc. – Paus. 3, 7.—A famous Greek historian of Chios, disciple of Isocrates, who flourished B C 354. All his compositions are lost, except a few fragments quoted by ancient writers. He is compared to Thucydides and Herodotus as an historian, yet he is severely censured for his satirical remarks and illiberal reflections. He obtained a prize in which his master was a competitor, and he was liberally rewarded for composing the best funeral oration in honour of Mausolus. His father's name was Damostratus. Plut. in Lys. – C. Nep 7.—Paus 6, 18. – Quintil. 10, 1.

THEOXENIA, a festival celebrated in honour of all the gods in every city of Greece, but especially at Athens. The Dioscuri established a festival of the same name, in honour of the gods who had visited them at one of their entertainments.

THEOXENIUS, a surname of Apollo.

THERA, now Santorin, the most celebrated of the Sporades, situate about 700 stadia from the Cretan coast, and nearly 200 stadia in circumference. It was said by mythologists to have been formed in the sea, by a clod of earth, thrown from the ship Argo, and on its first appearance obtained the name of Calliste. It was first colonised by the Phœnicians, and afterwards by the Lacedæmonians, who settled here the descendants of the Minyæ after they had been expelled by the Pelasgi from Lemnos. Theras, who headed this fugitive colony, gave his name to the island. Several generations afterwards, these Minyæ, under Battus, founded Cyrene in Africa. Strab. 10. Plin. 4, 12.—Herod. 4, 147, 150, &c.—Paus. 3, 1.—Pind. Pyth. 4, 10.

THERAMÉNES, an Athenian philosopher and general in the age of Alcibiades. His father's name was Agnon. He was one of the thirty tyrants at Athens, but he had no share in the cruelties and oppression which disgraced their administration. He was accused by Critias, one of his colleagues, because he opposed their views, and he was condemned to drink hemlock, though defended by his own innocence, and the friendly intercession of the philosopher Socrates. He drank the poison with great composure, and poured some of it on the ground, with the sarcastical exclamation of, This is to the health of Critias. This happened about 404 years before the Christian era. Theramenes, on account of the fickleness of his disposition, has been called Cothurnus, a kind of shoe used for either foot. Cic. de Orat. 3, 16. – Plut. in Alcib. &c. C. Nep.

THERAPNÆ, a town of Laconia, south-east of Sparta, and near the Eurotas. It received its name from Therapne, daughter of Lelex. Here were shown the temple of Menelaus, as well as his tomb and that of Helen, and a temple of the Dioscuri, who are hence surnamed Therapnæi fratres. Therapnæ probably corresponds with the village of Chrysapha, about two miles to the south-east of the ruins of Sparta. Pind Isthm. 1, 43. Pyth 11, 95. Nem. 10, 105.—A town of Bœotia, between Thebes and the river Asopus, and in a line nearly with Potniæ. Strab. 9.

THERMA, a town of Macedonia, afterwards called Thessalonica, in honour of the wife of Cassander, and now Salonichi. Vid Thessalonica.

THERMÆ, (baths). This term is frequently used in connection with an adjective: thus, Thermæ Selinuntiæ are the warm baths adjacent to the ancient Selinus, now Scaccia; Thermæ Himeræenses, those adjacent to Himera on the northern coast of Sicily, now Termini, which has also become the modern name for the remains of the ancient city. So also in speaking of the warm baths constructed at Rome by various emperors, we read of the Thermæ of Diocletian, &c.

THERMAICUS SINUS, a large bay setting up between the coast of Pieria and that of Chalcidice, and deriving its name from the city of Therma at its north-eastern extremity. It was also called Macedonicus Sinus, from its advancing so far into the country of Macedonia. The modern name is the gulf of Salonichi. Vid. Thessalonica.

THERMÖDON, a river of Pontus, rising in the mountains on the confines of Armenia Minor, and pursuing a course nearly due west until it reaches the plain of Themiscyra, when it turns to the north and empties into the Sinus Amisenus. It is celebrated by the poets of antiquity as the fabled seat of the Amazons. It is now called the Thermeh. Herod. 9, 27.—Virg. Æn. 11, 659.—Propert. 3, 14.—Plin. 6, 3.

THERMOPYLÆ, a small pass leading from

Thessaly into Locris and Phocis. It has a large ridge of mountains on the west, and the sea on the east, with deep and dangerous marshes, being in the narrowest part only 25 feet in breadth. Thermopylæ receives its name from the hot baths which are in the neighbourhood. It is celebrated for a battle which was fought there B.C. 480, on the 7th of August between Xerxes and the Greeks, in which 500 Spartans resisted for three successive days repeatedly the attacks of the most brave and courageous of the Persian army, which, according to some historians, amounted to five millions. There was also another battle fought there, between the Romans and Antiochus, king of Syria. Herodot. 7. 176, &c.—Liv. 36. 15.—Mela, 2. 3.—Paus. 7, 15.

THERMUS, or Thermum, a city of Ætolia, north-east of Stratos, considered from its inaccessible situation as the citadel of the whole country. Here were held splendid games and festivals, and here the Panætolic assemblies met to decide upon the affairs of the republic. This opulent and handsome city was twice attacked and razed to the ground by Philip the Third of Macedon, in revenge for the excesses committed by the Ætolians at Dium and Dodona. Polyb. 5. 7, &c. 11, 4.

THERON, a tyrant of Agrigentum, who died 472 B.C.——A Rutulian who attempted to kill Æneas. He perished in the attempt. Virg Æn. 10. 319.

THERSANDER, a son of Polynices and Argia. He accompanied the Greeks to the Trojan war, but he was killed in Mysia by Telephus, before the confederate army reached the enemy's country. Virg. Æn. 2. 261.—Apollod. 3, 7.——A son of Sisyphus, king of Corinth.

THERSILOCHUS, a leader of the Pæonians in the Trojan war, killed by Achilles. Virg. Æn. 6. 483.——A friend of Æneas, killed by Turnus. Id. 12, 363.

THERSITES, an officer, the most deformed and illiberal of the Greeks during the Trojan war. He was fond of ridiculing his fellow soldiers, particularly Agamemnon, Achilles, and Ulysses. Achilles killed him with one blow of his hat, because he laughed at his mourning the death of Penthesilea. Ovid ex Pont 4, 1d, 15.—Apollod. 1, 8.—Homer. Il 2. 212, &c.

THESEIDÆ, a patronymic given to the Athenians from Theseus, one of their kings. Virg. G. 2. 383.

THESEIS, a poem written by Codrus containing an account of the life and actions of Theseus, and now lost. Jur 1, 2.

THESEUS, king of Athens, and son of Ægeus, by Æthra, the daughter of Pittheus, was one of the most celebrated of the heroes of antiquity. He was educated at Troezene in the house of Pittheus, and as he was not publicly acknowledged to be the son of the king of Athens, he passed for the son of Neptune. When he came to years of maturity, he was sent by his mother to his father, and a sword was given him, by which he might make himself known to Ægeus in a private manner. [Vid. Ægeus.] His journey to Athens was not across the sea, as it was usual with travellers, but Theseus determined to signalise himself in going by land, and encountering difficulties. The road which led from Troezene to Athens was infested with robbers and wild beasts, and rendered impassable; but these obstacles were easily removed by the courageous son of Ægeus. He destroyed Corynetes, Symnis, Sciron, Cercyon, Procrustes, and the celebrated Phæa. At Athens, however, his reception was not cordial; Medea lived there with Ægeus, and as she knew that her influence would fall to the ground, if Theseus was received in his father's house, she attempted to destroy him before his arrival was made public. Ægeus was himself to give the cup of poison to this unknown stranger at a feast, but the sight of his sword on the side of Theseus reminded him of his amours with Æthra. He knew him to be his son, and the people of Athens were glad to find that this illustrious stranger, who had cleared Attica from robbers and pirates, was the son of their monarch. The Pallantides, who expected to succeed their uncle Ægeus on the throne, as he apparently had no children, attempted to assassinate Theseus, but they fell a prey to their own barbarity, and were all put to death by the young prince. The bull of Marathon next engaged the attention of Theseus. The labour seemed arduous, but he caught the animal alive, and after he had led it through the streets of Athens, he sacrificed it to Minerva, or the god of Delphi. After this, Theseus went to Crete, among the seven chosen youths whom the Athenians yearly sent to be devoured by the Minotaur. The wish to deliver his country from so dreadful a tribute, engaged him to undertake this expedition. He was successful, by means of Ariadne, the daughter of Minos, who was enamoured of him, and after he had escaped from the labyrinth with a clue of thread and killed the Minotaur. [Vid Minotaurus.] he sailed from Crete with six boys and seven maidens, whom his victory had equally redeemed from death. In the island of Naxos, where he was driven by the winds, he had the meanness to abandon Ariadne, to whom he was indebted for his safety. The rejoicings which his return might have occasioned at Athens, were interrupted by the death of Ægeus, who threw himself into the sea when he saw his son's ship return with black sails, which was the signal of ill success. [Vid Ægeus.] His ascension on his father's throne was universally applauded, B.C. 1235. The Athenians were governed with mildness, and Theseus made new regulations, and enacted new laws. The number of the inhabitants of Athens was increased by the liberality of the monarch, religious worship was attended with more than usual solemnity, a court was instituted which had the care of all civil affairs, and Theseus made the government democratical, while he reserved for himself only the command of the armies. The fame which he had gained by his victories and policy, made his alliance courted; but Pirithous, king of the Lapithæ, alone wished to gain his friendship, by meeting him in the field of battle. He invaded the territories of Attica, and when Theseus had marched out to meet him, the two enemies, struck at the sight of each other, rushed between their two armies, to embrace one another in the most cordial and affectionate manner, and from that time began the most sincere and admired friendship, which has become proverbial. Theseus was present at the nuptials of his friend, and he was the most eager and courageous of the Lapithæ, in the defence of Hippodamia and her female attendants, against the brutal attempts of the Centaurs. When Pirithous had lost Hippodamia, he agreed with Theseus, whose wife Phædra was also dead, to carry away some of the daughters of the gods. The first attempt was upon Helen, the daughter of Leda, and after they had obtained this beautiful prize, they cast lots, and she became the property of Theseus. The Athenian monarch entrusted her to the care of his mother Æthra, at Aphidnæ, till she was of nubile years, but the resentment of Castor and Pollux soon obliged him to restore her safe into their hands. Helen, before she reached Sparta, became mother of a daughter by Theseus; but this tradition, confirmed by some ancient mythologists, is confuted by others, who affirm that she was but nine years old when carried away by the two royal friends, and Ovid introduces her in one of his epistles, saying, Excepto redit pasta Iphore mihi. Some time after Theseus assisted his friend in procuring a wife, and they both descended into the infernal regions to carry away Proserpine. Pluto, apprised of their intentions, stopped them. Pirithous was placed on his father's wheel, and Theseus was tied to a huge stone on which he had sat to rest himself. Virgil represents him in this eternal state of punishment, repeating to the shades in Tartarus, the words of Discite justitiam moniti et non temnere divos. Apollodorus however, and others declare, that he was not long detained in hell; when Hercules came to steal the dog Cerberus, he tore him away from the stone, but with such violence, that his skin was left behind. The same assistance was given to Pirithous, and the two friends returned upon the earth by the favour of Hercules, and the consent of the infernal deities, not, however, without suffering the most excruciating torments. During the captivity of Theseus in the kingdom of Pluto, Mnestheus, one of the descendants of Erechtheus, ingratiated himself into the favour of the people of Athens, and obtained the crown in preference to the children of the absent monarch. At his return Theseus attempted to eject the usurper, but to no purpose. The Athenians had forgotten his many services, and he retired with great mortification to the court of Lycomedes, king of the island of Scyros. After paying him much attention, Lycomedes, either jealous of his fame, or bribed by the presents of Mnestheus, carried him to a high rock, on pretence of showing him the extent of his dominions, and threw him down a deep precipice. Some suppose that Theseus inadvertently fell down this precipice, and that he was crushed to death without receiving any violence from Lycomedes. The children of Theseus, after the death of Mnestheus, recovered the Athenian throne, and that the memory of their father might not be without the honours due to a hero, they brought his remains from Scyros, and gave them a magnificent burial. They also raised statues and a temple, and festivals and games were publicly instituted to commemorate the actions of a hero, who had rendered such services to the people of Athens. These festivals were still celebrated with original solemnity in the age of Pausanias and Plutarch, about 1260 years after the death of Theseus. The historians disagree from the poets in their accounts about this hero, and they all suppose, that instead of attempting to carry away the wife of Pluto, the two friends went to seduce a daughter of Aidoneus, king of the Molossi. This daughter, as they say, bore the name of Proserpine, and the dog which kept the gates of the palace was called Cerberus, and hence perhaps arises the fiction of the poets. Pirithous was torn to pieces by the dog, but Theseus was confined in prison, from whence he made his escape some time after, by the assistance of Hercules. Some authors place Theseus and his friend in the number of the Argonauts, but they were both detained, either in the infernal regions, or in the country of the Molossi, in the time of Jason's expedition to Colchis. Plut. in Vita – Apollod. 3. – Hygin. fab 14, 79. Paus. 1, 2, &c.– *Ovid. THESIDÆ, a name given to the people of Athens, because they were governed by Theseus.

THESMOPHORA, a surname of Ceres, as lawgiver, in whose honour festivals were instituted called Thesmophoria. The Thesmophoria were instituted by Triptolemus, or, according to some, by Orpheus, or the daughters of Danaus. The greatest part of the Grecian cities, especially Athens, observed them with great solemnity. The worshippers were free born women, whose husbands were obliged to defray the expenses of the festival. They were assisted by a priest called θεσμοφορος, because he carried a cranon on his head. There were also certain virgins who officiated, and were maintained at the public expense. The free-born women were dressed in white robes to intimate their spotless innocence; they were charged to observe the strictest chastity during three or five days before the celebration, and during the four days of the solemnity; and on that account it was usual for them to strew their bed with agnus castus, Acanthus, and all such herbs as were supposed to have the power of expelling all venereal propensities. They were also charged not to eat pomegranates, or to wear garlands on their heads, as the whole was to be observed with the greatest signs of seriousness and gravity, without any display of wantonness or levity. It was however, usual to jest at one another, as the goddess Ceres had been made to smile by a merry expression when she was sad and melancholy for the recent loss of her daughter Proserpine. Three days were required for the preparation, and upon the 11th of the month called Pyanepsion, the women went to Eleusis, carrying books on their heads, in which the laws which the goddess had invented were contained. On the 14th of the same month the festival began, on the 16th day a fast was observed, and the women sat on the ground in token of humiliation. It was usual during the festival to offer prayers to Ceres, Proserpine, Pluto, and Calligenia, whom some suppose to be the nurse or favourite maid of the goddess of corn, or perhaps one of her surnames. There were some sacrifices of a mysterious nature, and all persons whose offence was small were released from confinement. Such as were initiated at the festivals of Eleusis assisted at the Thesmophoria. The place of high priest was hereditary in the family of Eumolpus. Ovid. Met. 10, 431. Fast. 4, 619.—Apollod. 1, 4.—Virg. Æn. 4, 58.—Sophocl. in Œdip. Col.—Clem. Alex.

THESMOTHETÆ, a name given to the last six Archons among the Athenians, because they took particular care to enforce the laws, and to see justice impartially administered. They were at that time nine in number.

THESPIA, or Thespiæ, a town of Bœotia, 40 stadia from Ascra, and near the foot of Helicon, looking towards the south and the Crissæan gulf. The Thespians alone of all the Bœotians refused to tender earth and water as a token of submission to Xerxes. They assisted Leonidas at Thermopylæ, and hence drew upon them the anger of the Persians, who burnt their city. Thespia was the birth-place of the celebrated courtezan Phryne, who, on receiving as a present from Praxiteles a beautiful statue of Cupid presented it to her native city. Pausanias affirms that this celebrated statue was sent to Rome by Caligula, but was afterwards restored to Thespia by Claudius. Nero removed it again to Rome, where it was destroyed by fire. Pliny, however, asserts that it still existed in his day in the schools of Octavia. It is now pretty well ascertained, by the researches of recent travellers, that the ruins of Thespia are occupied by the modern Eremo Castro. Herod 7, 132 et 222, 8, 50.—Strab 9.—Paus. 9, 26. Plin 36, 5.

THESPIADES, a name given to the 50 daughters of Thespius. Vid. Thespius.—Also a surname of the nine Muses, because they were held in great veneration in Thespia.

THESPIS, a Greek poet of Attica, supposed by some to be the inventor of tragedy, 536 years before Christ. His representations were very rustic and imperfect. He went from town to town upon a cart, on which was erected a temporary stage, where two actors, whose faces were daubed with the lees of wine, entertained the audience with choral songs, &c. Solon was a great enemy to his dramatic representations. Horat. Art. P. 276. Drog THESPROTIA, a district of Epirus, along the coast opposite to Corcyra, and extending also some distance inland. Of all the Epirotic tribes, the Thesproti appear to have been the most ancient. Hom. Od. 14, 315.—Herod 2, 56 7. 176.—Strab. 7.

THESSALIA a country of Greece, bounded on the south by mount Œta; on the west by the range of Pindus, dividing it from Epirus; on the north by the Cambunian mountains, extending from Pindus to Olympus, and separating it from Macedonia; and on the east by the Ægean sea. In earlier times it bore the several names of Æmonia, Argos Pelasgicum, Hellas, Pyrrha, Æolis, &c.; that of Thessalia being derived from Thessalus, one of its kings. It was originally composed of many principalities which united themselves subsequently, under the direction of a supreme magistrate, into a federal body, the first society of the kind established in Greece. Its government, however, brought it but little glory, for with the exception of one momentary period of splendour in its history, Thessaly appears to have been one of the weakest and most insignificant provinces in the whole country; at the same time that its resources, its extent, and its capability of defence, ought to have gained for it the very highest rank amongst the other states. After having successively submitted to the yokes of Persia and Macedonia, it was wrested from the latter power by the Romans, after the victory of Cynoscephalæ, when it was declared free by a decree of the senate and people, or in other words, was made a Roman province. With the exception perhaps of Bœotia, Thessaly seems to have been the most fertile and productive part of Greece, in wine, oil, and corn, but more especially the latter, of which it exported a considerable quantity to foreign countries. Hence, as might be expected, the Thessalians were the wealthiest people in Greece, nor were they exempt from those vices which riches and luxury generally bring in their train. Their treachery was so proverbial, that false coin was called Thessalian money, and a perfidious action Thessalian deceit. They were likewise remarkable superstitious, and much addicted to witchcraft, incantations, and the study of magic. It seems to have been the general opinion of antiquity, that Thessaly was at some remote period covered by the waters of the Peneus and its tributary rivers, until some great revolution of nature had rent asunder the gorge of Tempe, and thus afforded a passage to the pent up streams, a tradition connected no doubt with the deluge, which was said to have flooded the country in the days of Deucalion. Herod 7, 176.—Strab 9. Liv. 3, 32 36, 9 &c.—*Nep. THESSALIOTIS, a part of Thessaly, at the south of the river Peneus.

THESSALONICA, a large and populous city and sea-port of Macedonia, the capital of one of the four districts into which the Romans divided that country after its conquest by Paulus Æmilius. It was situated at the north-eastern extremity of the Sinus Thermaicus, and was anciently called Therma; but, being rebuilt by Philip the father of Alexander, after his victory over the Thessalians, it then received the name of Thessalonica. At the time of writing the epistle to the Thessalonians, Thessalonica was the residence of the proconsul who governed the province of Macedonia, and of the quæstor who had the charge of the imperial revenues. Besides being the seat of government, this port carried on an extensive commerce, which caused a great influx of strangers from all quarters, so that Thessalonica was remarkable for the number, wealth, and learning of its inhabitants. The Jews were extremely numerous here. The modern name of this place is Salonichi. It is the chief port of modern Greece and has a population of 6000 persons 1200 of whom are Jews. Thucyd. 1, 21 2, 29.—Strab Epist 7. Liv 44, 10 et 45, 45, 29.——A daughter of Philip, king of Macedonia, sister to Alexander the Great. She married Cassander, by whom she had a son called Antipater, who put her to death. Paus 8, 7

THESSALUS, son of Hercules and Calliope, daughter of Eurypilus.——A physician of Lydia in the age of Nero. He gained the favours of the great and opulent at Rome, by the meanness and servility of his behaviour. He treated all physicians with contempt, and thought himself superior to all his predecessors.

THESTALUS a son of Hercules and Epicaste. Apollod 2, 7.

THESTYLIS, a countrywoman mentioned in Theocritus and Virgil.

THETIS, one of the sea deities, daughter of Nereus and Doris, often confounded with Tethys her grandmother She was courted by Neptune and Jupiter; but when the gods were informed that the son she should bring forth must become greater than his father, their addresses were stopped, and Peleus, the son of Æacus, was permitted to solicit her hand. Thetis refused him, but the lover had the artifice to catch her when asleep, and by binding her strongly, he prevented her from escaping from his grasp, in assuming different forms. When Thetis found that she could not elude the vigilance of her lover, she consented to marry him, though much against her inclination. Their nuptials were celebrated on mount Pelion with great pomp; all the deities attended except the goddess of Discord, who punished the negligence of Peleus, by throwing into the midst of the assembly a golden apple, to be given to the fairest of all the goddesses. [Vid Discordia.] Thetis became mother of several children by Peleus, but all these she destroyed by fire in attempting to see whether they were immortal. Achilles must have shared the same fate, if Peleus had not snatched him from her hand as she was going to repeat the cruel operation. She afterwards rendered him invulnerable by plunging him in the waters of the Styx, except that part of the heel by which she held him As Thetis well knew the fate of her son, she attempted to remove him from the Trojan war by concealing him in the court of Lycomedes. This was useless he went with the rest of the Greeks The mother, still anxious for his preservation, prevailed upon Vulcan to make him a suit of armour, but when it was done, she refused the god the favours which she had promised him. When Achilles was killed by Paris, Thetis issued out of the sea with the Nereides to mourn his death, and after she had collected his ashes in a golden urn, she raised a monument to his memory, and instituted festivals in his honour. *Hesiod. THEUTIS or TEUTHIS, a prince of a town of the same name in Arcadia, who went to the Trojan war. He quarrelled with Agamemnon at Aulis, and when Minerva under the form of Melas son of Ops, attempted to pacify him, he struck the goddess and returned home. Some say that the goddess afterwards appeared to him and showed him the wound which he had given her in the thigh, and that he died soon after. Pous. 8, 28.

THIA, the mother of the sun, moon and Aurora, by Hyperion. [Vid. Thea.] Hesiod. Theog 371.——One of the Sporades that rose out of the sea in the age of Pliny. Plin 27, 12.

THIMBRON, a Lacedæmonian, chosen general to conduct a war against Persia. He was recalled, and afterwards re-appointed. He died B. C 391.

THIRMIDA, a town in the interior of Numidia, where Hiempsal was slain by the soldiers of Jugurtha. Sall. Jug. 12 et 41.

THISBE, a beautiful woman of Babylon. [Vid. Pyramus.]——A town of Bœotia, north-west of Ascra, and near the confines of Phocis. It was famed for its abounding in wild pigeons. The modern Kakosia marks its site. Hom. Il. 2, 502. - Strab 9.

THOAS, a king of Taurica Chersonesus, in the age of Orestes and Pylades. He would have immolated these two celebrated strangers on Diana's altars, according to the barbarous customs of the country, had they not been delivered by Iphigenia. [Vid. Iphigenia.] According to some, Thoas was the son of Borysthenes. Ovid Pont 3, 2.——A king of Lemnos, son of Bacchus and Ariadne, the daughter of Minos, and husband of Hypsine. He had been made king of Lemnos by Rhadamanthus. He was still alive when the Lemnian women conspired to kill all the males in the island, but his life was spared by his only daughter Hipsipyle, in whose favour he had resigned the crown. Hipsipyle obliged her father to depart secretly from Lemnos, to escape from the fury of the women, and he arrived safe in a neighbouring island, which some call Chios, though many suppose that Thoas was assassinated by the enraged females before he had left Lemnos. Some mythologists confound the king of Lemnos with that of Chersonesus, and suppose that they were one and the same man. According to their opinion, Thoas was the young when he retired from Lemnos, and after that he went to Taurica Chersonesus, where he settled. Flacc. 8, 208 - Hygin. fab. 74, 120.—Ovid. in Ib 394. Herod. 6, 114.—*Stat. THOMYRIS, called also Tamyris, Tameris, Thamyris and Tomeris, was queen of the Massagetæ. After her husband's death she marched against Cyrus, who wished to invaded her territories, cut his army to pieces, and killed him on the spot. The barbarous queen ordered the head of the fallen monarch to be cut off and thrown into a vessel full of human blood, exclaiming as this was done, "Take then thy fill," or words to that effect. Her son had been conquered by Cyrus before she marched herself at the head of her armies. Herod. 1, 205.—Justin. 1, 8.

THRACES, the inhabitants of Thrace Vid. Thracia.

THRACIA. In its extended sense, comprehended the whole country bounded on the north by the Danube, on the east by the Euxine and Propontis, on the south by the Ægean sea, and on the west by the rivers Strymon and Drinus, connected by the chain of Mons Scardus. This great extent of country, governed by many princes, was divided on its conquest by the Romans into Mœsia and Thracia properly so called. The latter province, answering to the modern district of Roumelia in its confined sense, was bounded on the north by the chain of mount Hæmus, on the east by the Euxine and Propontis, on the south by the Ægean sea, and on the west by the river Nestus, though its limits in this last direction extended once to the river Strymon. At a much later period, it was subdivided into four districts; Europa in the south-east, Rhodope in the south-west, Thracia to the north-west, and Hæmimontus to the north-east. The Thracians are said to have obtained their name from Thrax, the son of Mars, but the later Greek writers regarded it as originally derived from the word θρασεια, denoting rough in their language, and thought that this country was so named from its mountainous nature. The appellation, however, used by the oriental writers to distinguish Thrace, plainly shows that the name of the country was originally derived from Tiraz or Thiraz the son of Japhet, who probably settled in the north-western extremity of Asia Minor, whence his descendants afterwards sent colonies into Thrace in Europe. The Thracians were a cruel though brave and warlike people, whence Mars was said to have been born in their country, and to have resided amongst them; but, notwithstanding this, they attained to a remarkable state of civilization. Herod. 4, 99. 5, 3.—Strab. 1 et 7.—*Virg. THRASEAS, Pætus, a Roman senator in the reign of Nero, distinguished for his integrity and patriotism. He was a native of Patavium, educated in the tenets of Stoicism, and a warm admirer of the character of Cato of Utica, whose life he wrote. His contempt of the base adulation of the senate, and his open and manly animadversions on the enormities of the emperor, were the occasion of his being condemned to death. He died A.D. 66, in the 13th year of Nero's reign. Tacitus says that Nero endeavoured to extirpate virtue itself by the destruction of Pætus and Soranus. Juv. 5, 36.—Martial. 1, 19.—Tacit Ann 15, 16

THRASYBULUS a famous general of Athens, who began the expulsion of the thirty tyrants of his country though he was only assisted by thirty of his friends. His efforts were attended with success, B.C. 401, and the only reward he received for this patriotic action was a crown made with two twigs of an olive-branch; a proof of his own disinterestedness and of the virtue of his countrymen. The Athenians employed a man whose abilities and humanity were so conspicuous, and Thrasybulus was sent with a powerful fleet to recover their lost power in the Ægean, and on the coast of Asia. After he had gained many advantages, this great man was killed in his camp by the inhabitants of Aspendus, whom his soldiers had plundered without his knowledge, B. C 391. Diod. 14.—C. Nep in Vita. Cic Phil.—Val. M x 4, 1.—A tyrant of Miletus B C 501.—A son of Gelon, banished from Syracuse, of which he was the tyrant, B.C 466.

THRASYLLUS a man of Attica, so disordered in his mind that he believed all the ships which entered the Piræus to be his own. He was cured by means of his brother, whom he liberally reproached for depriving him of that happy illusion of mind. Ælian. V. H. 4, 25.—One of the Athenian commanders at the battle of Arginusæ, condemned to death with his colleagues for omitting to collect and bury the dead after the action. [Vid Arginusæ.]—A Greek Pythagorean philosopher and mathematician, who enjoyed the favours and the friendship of Augustus and Tiberius. Suet in Tib 14.

THRASYMACHUS, a native of Carthage who became the pupil of Isocrates and of Plato. Though he was a public teacher at Athens, he starved for want of bread, and at last hanged himself. Juv 7, 204

THRASYMENUS, a lake of Italy, in Etruria, a few miles to the south of Cortona, celebrated for a battle fought there between Hannibal and the Romans, under Flaminius, B C 217. No less than 15 000 Romans were left dead on the field of battle, and 10 000 taken prisoners, or, according to Livy, 6000, or Polybius 15,000. The loss of Hannibal was about 1500 men. About 10 000 Romans made their escape all covered with wounds. This lake is now called Lago di Perugia, from the city of Perugia, the ancient Perusia, at its southern extremity. Strab 5. Ovid Fast. 6, 765.

THRESCIUS of Thrace, Orpheus is called by way of eminence Threscius Sacerdos. Virg Æn. 6, 645

THRESSA, an epithet applied to Harpalyce, a native of Thrace. Virg Æn. 1, 320.

THRIAMBUS, one of the surnames of Bacchus.

THRONIUM, a town of the Locri Epicnemidii, in Greece, near the river Boagrus. It was thirty stadia from Scarphea, and at some distance from the coast. It was taken by the Athenians during the Peloponnesian war, and several years after it fell into the hands of Onomarchus the Phocian general, who enslaved the inhabitants. Homer Il. 2, 533.—Strab. 9.—Thucyd 2, 26.—*Diod. THUCYDIDES, a celebrated Greek historian, was born in the 77th Olympiad, about 470 B.C. He was the son of Olorus, or Orolus, which name, being that of a Thracian prince, indicates a connection with that country; and it appears from his own information that he possessed gold mines in it, and had a considerable influence over its chiefs. His family was one of the principal in Athens, and was related to that of Miltiades. He received the liberal education usual among Athenians of rank, and was instructed in rhetoric by Antiphon, and in philosophy by Anaxagoras. The generous emulation with which he was inspired, manifested itself upon hearing Herodotus recite his history at the Olympic festival, when he burst into tears; and that distinguished writer observing the circumstance, is said to have congratulated Olorus on his son's disposition. He was at Athens during the dreadful pestilence in that city at the commencement of the Peloponnesian war, and bore a share in the calamity. In the eighth year of that war he had a command in Thrace, where he was opposed to the distinguished Spartan general, Brasidas; and the latter having surprised the town of Amphipolis, Thucydides was punished for the loss, which apparently he could not have prevented, by banishment. His exile was fortunate for literature, since he occupied himself during the twenty years of its continuance in making the inquiries through different parts of Greece which enabled him to compose his history, conversing with the principal actors on both sides in the events which he recorded and sparing no pains to obtain an accurate view of their causes and of the different interests of states and individuals. He resided a considerable time in Thrace; but of his farther life, and the time and place of his death, nothing certain is known. It is the conjecture of Dodwell that he passed his 70th year, and died in Thrace. The history of Thucydides comprehends the transactions of the first 20 years of the Peloponnesian war, disposed in eight books, it indeed goes back some years earlier to the war between Corinth and Corcyra; but this is by way of preliminary to his subject, while developing the causes of the long contest which he afterwards describes, and which continued still eight years beyond the close of his narrative. Although he has taken a topic much more limited than that of his predecessor and rival in fame, Herodotus, yet the manner in which he has treated it, may justly give him the preference in historical merit, and entitle his work to that praise which an eminent modern writer has given it, that "the first page of Thucydides is the commencement of real history." His characteristics are great diligence in ascertaining facts from the best authority, which, indeed, in many instances was his personal knowledge; and, as far as we can judge, perfect impartiality, so that it would not be possible to discover from his narrative what was his country or party. As examples of this quality, he has painted as a great man his antagonist Brasidas; and has mentioned his own banishment as a simple fact, with no other remark than that it afforded him the necessary leisure for the task he undertook. Further, sagacity in tracing causes and effects, and a philosophical spirit in forming his judgment of human affairs, place him in the class of the first writers in this department. His subject has not afforded him much scope for striking description, yet he has given specimens of narrative which are highly interesting, and denote the writer of genius. His style has been the subject of much criticism, and certainly excellence in that respect is not the quality for which he is most to be valued. It is of the kind anciently termed the austere. It aims at force and brevity, rather than harmony, elegance or perspicuity. Its extreme conciseness, and bold transpositions, render it frequently obscure, a defect not compensated by its energy and elevation. The best editions of Thucydides are that of Hudson, fol. Oxon. 1696; that of Gottleber and Bauer, 2 vols. 4to, Lips. 1790 - 1804: that of Haack, 2 vols. 8vo, Lips. 1820; that of Becker, 4 vols. 8vo, Oxon 1821, and that of Bloomfield, 3 vols. 12mo, Lond. 1830. There are two excellent English translations of Thucydides, one by Smith, and the other by Bloomfield.——A rival of Pericles.——A son of Mennon

THULE, an island in the most northern parts of the German ocean, to which, on account of its great distance from the continent, the ancients gave the epithet of ultima. Its situation was never accurately ascertained, hence its present name is unknown by modern historians. Some suppose that it is the island now called Iceland, or part of Greenland, whilst others imagine it to be the Shetland isles. *Stat. THURII a city of Lucania, in Lower Italy, near the site of the more ancient Sybaris, and which was founded by a colony from Athens, about fifty-five years after the overthrow of the latter city. Two celebrated characters are named among those who joined this expedition, which was collected from different parts of Greece; these were Herodotus, and Lysias the orator. The remains of ancient Thurii must be placed between the site of ancient Sybaris and Terra Nova. Aristot. de Rhet. 3, 9.—Diod. Sic. 12, 10.—Strab. 6.

THURINUS, a name given to Augustus when he was young, either because some of his progenitors were natives of Thurium, or because they had distinguished themselves there. Suet. Aug. 7

THUSCIA, a country of Italy, the same as Etruria Vid. Etruria.

THYADES, (ung. THYAS,) a name of the Bacchanals. They received it from Thyas, daughter of Castalius, and mother of Delphus, by Apollo. She was the first woman who was priestess of the god Bacchus. Virg. Æn. 4, 302. —Paus. 10, 4.

THYAMIS, now the Calama, a river of Epirus, dividing Thesprotia from the district of Cestrine. It appears from Cicero, that Atticus had an estate on the banks of the Thyamis. Thucyd. 1, 46.—Cic. ad Att. 7, 7 —A promontory of Epirus, near the river of the same name, now Cape Nisi.

THYATIRA, now Akhisar, a city of Lydia, near the northern confines, situate on the small river Lycus, not far from its source. Strabo informs us, that it was a Macedonian colony, and Steph. Byz confirms this account, while he adds to it by saying, that it was named by Seleucus Nicanor. Antiochus was encamped in its vicinity when about to engage with the Roman army under Scipio, but retired to Magnesia on his approach. It surrendered to the consul after the battle. Thyatira is interesting to the Christian antiquarian, as one of the seven churches of the Apocalypse. Strab. 13.— Liv. 37, 8 et 44. —Apoc 1, 11. 2, 18

fused to take him as his colleague on the throne of Argos. This was no sooner known, than Atreus divorced Ærope, and banished Thyestes from his kingdom; but soon after, the more effectually to punish his infidelity, he expressed a wish to be reconciled to him, and recalled him to Argos. Thyestes was received by his brother at an elegant entertainment, but he was soon informed that he had been feeding upon the flesh of one of his own children. This Atreus took care to communicate to him by showing him the remains of his son's body. This action appeared so barbarous, that, according to the ancient mythologists, the sun changed his usual course, not to be a spectator of so bloody a scene. Thyestes escaped from his brother, and fled to Epirus. Some time after he met his daughter Pelopeia in a grove sacred to Minerva, and he offered her violence without knowing who she was. This incest, however, according to some, was intentionally committed by the father, as he had been told by an oracle, that the injuries he had received from Atreus would be avenged by a son born from himself and Pelopeia. The daughter, pregnant by her father, was seen by her uncle Atreus and married, and some time after she brought into the world a son, whom she exposed in the woods. The life of the child was preserved by goats, he was called Ægysthus, and presented to his mother, and educated in the family of Atreus. When grown to years of maturity the mother gave her son Ægysthus a sword, which she had taken from her unknown ravisher in the grove of Minerva, with hopes of discovering who he was. Meantime Atreus, intent to punish his brother, sent Agamemnon and Menelaus to pursue him, and when at last they found him, he was dragged to Argos, and thrown into a close prison. Ægysthus was sent to murder Thyestes, but the father recollected the sword, which was raised to stab him, and a few questions convinced him that his assassin was his own son. Pelopeia was present at this discovery, and when she found that she had committed incest with her father, she asked Ægysthus to examine the sword, and immediately plunged it into her own breast. Ægysthus rushed from the prison to Atreus, with the bloody weapon, and murdered him near an altar, as he wished to offer thanks to the gods on the supposed death of Thyestes. At the death of Atreus, Thyestes was placed on his brother's throne by Ægysthus, from which he was soon after driven by Agamemnon and Menelaus. He retired from Argos, and was banished into the island of Cythera by Agamemnon, where he died. Apollod. 2, 4. Sophocl. in Ajac. 1311. — Hygin. fab 88, &c. — Ovid. in Ib. 398. — Lucan. 1 541 7, 481 Senec. in Thyest.

THYMBRA, a place in Troas, through which a small river, called Thymbrius, falls in its course to the Scamander. Apollo had a temple there, and from thence he is called Thymbræus. Achilles was killed there by Paris, according to some. Plin. 5, 30 — Homer. Il. 10, 430.

THYMBRÆUS, a surname of Apollo. Virg. Æn. 3, 363 Æn. 3, 85 Val. Thymbra.

THYMELE, a celebrated female dancer, favoured by Domitian. Juv. 1, 36.

THYMŒTES, a king of Athens, son of Oxinthus, the last of the descendants of Theseus, who reigned at Athens. He was deposed because he refused to accept a challenge sent by Xanthus, king of Bœotia, and was succeeded by a Messenian, B. C. 1128, who repaired the honour of Athens by fighting the Bœotian king. Paus. 2, 18.——A Trojan prince, whose wife and son were put to death by order of Priam. It was to revenge the king's cruelty that he persuaded his countrymen to bring the wooden horse within their city. He was son of Laomedon, according to some. Virg. Æn. 2, 32 — Dictys Cret. 3, 4.——A son of Hicetaon, who accompanied Æneas into Italy, and was killed by Turnus. Virg. Æn. 10, 124. 12 361

THYNI, or BITHYNI, a people of Bithynia; hence the words Thyna merx applied to their commodities Val. Bithynia

THYONE, a name given to Semele after she had been presented with immortality by her son Bacchus. Apollod. 3, 5.

THYONEUS, a surname of Bacchus from his mother Semele, who was called Thyone Apollod. 3 5. — Horat Od. 1, 17 13 — Ovid Met. 1, 13.

THYREA, the principal town of Cynuria, in Argolis, near which the celebrated battle was fought between 300 Argives and as many Spartans. Othryade, a champion of the latter people, remained master of the field, but only lived long enough to raise a trophy on the spot to Jupiter, which he inscribed with his own blood. The Spartans celebrated this victory with an annual festival, and having shortly after defeated the Argives in a second engagement, they continued in possession of the district until it was finally ceded by treaty to the latter people. Herod. 1, 82 — Paus. 3, 7 — Strab. 8

THYSSAGETE a people of Sarmatia who live upon hunting. Herodotus makes the Tanais rise in their territory. Plin. 4, 12

THYMBRIS, a river of Sardinia, now Oristagni.

TIBERIAS, still called by the natives Tabaria, was ancientlv one of the principal cities of Galilee. It was built by Herod the Great and so called in honour of the emperor Tiberius. The privileges conferred upon its inhabitants by Herod caused it in a short time to become a place of considerable note, it was situated in a plain near the lake of Gennesareth, which is thence termed the lake or sea of Tiberias. After the destruction of Jerusalem, this city became eminent for its academy, over which a succession of Jewish doctors presided until the fourth century. On every side ruins of walls, columns, and foundations indicate its ancient splendour. Joseph Ant. Jud 18 3 — Bell. Jud 2 8. 3 10.

TIBERINUS, son of Capetus, and king of Alba, was drowned in the river Albula, which on this account assumed the name of Tiberis, of which he became the protecting god. Liv. 1, 3 — Cic de Nat D. 2, 20 — Varro de L. L. 4, 5, &c. — Ovid. Fast 2, 381 4, 47

TIBERIS, TYBERIS, TIBER, or TIBRIS, a river of Italy on whose banks the city of Rome was built. It was originally called Albula, from the whiteness of its waters, and afterwards Tiberis, when Tiberinus, king of Alba, had been drowned there. It was also named Tyrrhenus, because it watered Etruria, and Lydius, because the inhabitants of the neighbourhood were supposed to be of Lydian origin. The Tiber rises in the Apennines, and falls into the Tyrrhene sea, 16 miles below Rome, after dividing Latium from Etruria. Ov. F. 3, 47, 329 5, 641, in Ib 511 — Luc. 1, 381 — *Varro L. TIBERIUS, CLAUDIUS DRUSUS NERO, a Roman emperor after the death of Augustus, descended from the family of the Claudii. In his early years he commanded popularity by entertaining the populace with magnificent shows and fights of gladiators, and he gained some applause in the funeral oration which he pronounced over his father, though only nine years old. His first appearance in the Roman armies was under Augustus, in the war against the Cantabri, and after acting in the capacity of general, he obtained victories in different parts of the empire, and was rewarded with a triumph. Yet, in the midst of his glory, Tiberius fell under the displeasure of Augustus, and retired to Rhodes, where he continued for seven years as an exile till by the influence of his mother Livia with the emperor he was recalled. His return to Rome was the more glorious, he had the command of the Roman armies in Illyricum, Pannonia, and Dalmatia, and seemed to divide the sovereign power with Augustus. At the death of this celebrated emperor, Tiberius, who had been adopted, assumed the reins of government, and while with dissimulation and affected modesty he wished to decline the dangerous office, he found time to try the fidelity of his friends, and to make the greatest part of the Romans believe that he was invested with the purple, not from his own choice, but by the recommendation of Augustus, and the urgent entreaties of the Roman senate. The beginning of his reign seemed to promise tranquillity to the world; Tiberius was a watchful guardian of the public peace, he was the friend of justice; and never assumed the sounding titles which must disgust a free nation, but he was satisfied to say of himself that he was the master of his slaves, the general of his soldiers, and the father of the citizens of Rome. That seeming moderation, however, which was but the fruit of the deepest policy, soon disappeared, and Tiberius was viewed in his real character. His ingratitude to his mother Livia, to whose intrigues he was indebted for the purple, his cruelty to his wife Julia, and his tyrannical oppression and murder of many noble senators, rendered him odious to the people, and suspected even by his most intimate favourites. The armies mutinied in Pannonia and Germany, but the tumults were silenced by the prudence of the generals and the fidelity of the officers, and the factious demagogues were abandoned to their condign punishment. This acted as a check upon Tiberius in Rome; he knew from thence, as his successors experienced, that his power was precarious, and his very existence in perpetual danger. He continued as he had begun, to pay the greatest deference to the senate; all libels against him he disregarded, and he observed, that, in a free city, the thoughts and the tongue of every man should be free. The taxes were gradually lessened, and luxury restrained by the salutary regulations, as well as by the prevailing example and frugality of the emperor. While Rome exhibited a scene of peace and public tranquillity, the barbarians were severally defeated on the borders of the empire, and Tiberius gained new honours, by the activity and valour of Germanicus and his other faithful lieutenants. Yet the triumphs of Germanicus were beheld with jealousy. Tiberius dreaded his power, he was envious of his popularity, and the death of that celebrated general in Antioch was, as some suppose, accelerated by poison, and the secret resentment of the emperor. Not only his relations and friends, but the great and opulent were sacrificed to his ambition, cruelty, and avarice; and there was scarce in Rome one single family that did not reproach Tiberius for the loss of a brother, a father, or a husband. He at last retired to the island of Capreæ, on the coast of Campania, where he buried himself in unlawful pleasures. The care of the empire was entrusted to favourites, among whom Sejanus for a while shone with uncommon splendour. In his solitary retreat the emperor proposed rewards to such as invented new pleasures, or could produce fresh luxuries. He forgot his age as well as his dignity and disgraced himself by the most unnatural vices and enormous indulgences which can draw a blush even upon the countenance of the most debauched and abandoned. While the emperor was lost to himself and the world, the provinces were harassed on every side by the barbarians, and Tiberius found himself insulted by those enemies whom hitherto he had seen fall prostrate at his feet with every mark of submissive adulation. At last grown weak and helpless through infirmities, he thought of his approaching dissolution, and as he well knew that Rome could not exist without a head, he nominated, as his successor, Caius Caligula. Many might enquire, why a youth naturally so vicious and abandoned as Caius was chosen to be the master of an extensive empire, but Tiberius wished his own cruelties to be forgotten in the barbarities which might be displayed in the reign of his successor, whose natural propensities he had well defined, in saying of Caligula that he bred a serpent for the Roman people, and a Phaeton for the rest of the empire. Tiberius died at Misenum the 16th of March, A.D. 37, in the 78th year of his age, after a reign of 22 years, six months, and 26 days. Caligula was accused of having hastened his end by suffocating him. The joy was universal when his death was known; and the people of Rome, in the midst of sorrow, had a moment to rejoice. Heedless of the calamities which awaited them in the succeeding reigns. The body of Tiberius was conveyed to Rome, and burnt with great solemnity. A funeral oration was pronounced by Caligula, who seemed to forget his benefactor while he expatiated on the praises of Augustus, Germanicus, and his own. The character of Tiberius has been examined with particular attention by historians, and his reign is the subject of the most perfect and elegant of all the compositions of Tacitus. When a private man, Tiberius was universally esteemed, when he had no superior, he was proud, arrogant, jealous, and revengeful. If he found his military operations conducted by a warlike general, he affected moderation and virtue, but when he got rid of the powerful influence of a favourite, he was tyrannical and dissolute. If, as some observe, he had lived in the times of the Roman republic, he might have been as conspicuous as his great ancestors; but the sovereign power lodged in his hands, rendered him vicious and oppressive. Yet, though he encouraged informers and favoured flattery, he blushed at the mean servilities of the senate, and derided the adulation of his courtiers, who approached him, he said, as if they approached a wild elephant. He was a patron of learning; he was an elegant and ready speaker, and dedicated some part of his time to study. He wrote a lyric poem, entitled, A complaint on the death of Lucius Cæsar, as also some Greek pieces in imitation of some of his favourite authors. He avoided all improper expressions, and all foreign words he to ally wished to banish from the Latin tongue. As instances of his humanity, it has been recorded that he was uncommonly liberal to the people of Asia Minor, whose habitations had been destroyed by a violent earthquake, A. D. 17. One of his officers wished him to increase the taxes, No, said Tiberius, a good shepherd must shear, not flay, his sheep. The senators wished to call the month of November, in which he was born, by his name, in imitation of Julius Cæsar and Augustus, in the months of July and August; but this he refused, saying, What will you do, conscript fathers, if you have thirteen Cæsars? Like the rest of the emperors, he received divine honours after death, and even during his life. It has been wittily observed by Seneca, that he never was intoxicated but once all his life, for he continued in a perpetual state of intoxication from the time he gave himself to drinking till the last moment of his existence. *Suet. in Vita, &c. TIBULLUS, ALBIUS ALBIUS, a celebrated Roman poet of the Augustan age, was of the equestrian rank, but whether he was a native of Rome or of a municipal town, is not ascertained. His patrimony was much impaired, either by his own prodigality, or by the devastation of the civil wars; but yet he does not seem to have been distinguished by any tokens of the liberality of Augustus and Mæcenas, the munificent patrons of literature at the period in which he lived, nor does he mention their names in any of his poems. M. Valerius Messala Corvinus, upon whom he composed a panegyric, was his particular friend and patron, whom he accompanied in his expedition to Asia; but he preferred peace and retirement in the society of one of those objects of his affection whom he has celebrated in his elegies. Horace, with whom he was intimate, has addressed to him an ode and an epistle, complimenting him as a candid judge of his writings, and describing him as possessed of every worldly advantage. It has been inferred, from an epigram of Domitius Marsus, that he died about the same time with Virgil, B.C. 19, in the flower of his age. Ovid lamented his death in a beautiful elegy, representing his mother and sister as mourners at his funeral, and speaking of him as a poet of the highest reputation. The poems of Tibullus are elegies in three books, and a panegyric on Messala. It is upon his elegies that his fame is exclusively founded, and both ancient and modern critics for the most part agree, that there are no compositions of the class, in any language, which surpass them in the appropriate qualities of elegance, tenderness, and that beautiful simplicity which is the character of real feeling. Love and rural life are their principal subjects. Though the passion he describes is illicit, and each book exhibits a separate flame, yet there are more touches of a pure, and what may be termed a conjugal affection, than in almost any other Roman poet. His language is a true example of what the Latins call terse, or neat and polished. He is easy and natural, with scarcely any measure of learned allusion or figure. This author is commonly printed in conjunction with Catullus and Propertius. Of the separate editions the most esteemed are, that of Broukhusius, 4to. Amst. 1708, that of Vulpius, 4to. Patav. 1749; that of Heyne, 8vo. Lips. 1755-27-98, and that of Wunderlich, 8vo. Lips. 1817.

TIBUR, an ancient town of Latium, northeast of Rome, on the banks of the Anio. According to Dionysius of Halicarnassus, it was originally a town of the Siculi, the most ancient inhabitants of Latium, and, as a proof of this fact, he mentions that the name of Sicelion was also attached to a portion of that city. Tibur, however, has a claim to a more illustrious though a later, origin, having been founded, according to some authors, by Catillus, an officer of Evander, while others pretend that this Catillus was a son of Amphiaraus, who, with his two brothers, migrated to Italy, and, having conquered the Siculi, gave to one of their towns the name of Tibur, from his brother Tiburtus. Tibur is one of the places that appear most frequently to have afforded an asylum to Roman fugitives. From what period it enjoyed the rights of a Roman city is not precisely known, but it was in all probability anterior to the civil wars of Marius and Sylla. The latter indeed is said to have deprived the Tiburtini of these privileges, but they regained them upon his abdication, and they were confirmed by the emperor Claudius. Hercules was the deity held in the greatest veneration at Tibur, and his temple, on the foundations of which the present cathedral is said to be built, was famous throughout Italy. Hence the epithet of Herculaneam given by the poets to this city. The modern name of Tibur is Tivoli. Dion. Hal. 1, 16. — Suet. Claud. — Strab. 5. — Virg. Æn. 7, 630. — *Horat. TIBURTUS, a brother of the founder of Tibur, which is hence often called Tiburtia mœnia. He was one of the sons of Amphiaraus. Virg. Æn. 7, 670.

TICIDA, CAIUS, a poet of Rome, who flourished a few years before the age of Cicero. He wrote epigrams in an easy and elegant style, and praised his mistress Metella under the fictitious name of Petilla, and chiefly excelled in amorous poetry. Only eight of his verses are preserved. Ovid Trist 2. 433.

TICINUM, a city of Cisalpine Gaul, situate on the river Ticinus, near its junction with the Padus. It was founded by the Lævi and Marici.

According to Tacitus, Augustus advanced as far as Teanum to meet the corpse of Drusus, father of Germanicus in the depth of winter, and from thence escorted it to Rome. Under the Lombard kings it assumed the name of Papia, which in process of time has been changed to Pavia. Plin., 3, 17. —Tacit. Ann 3, 5.

TICINUS, now the Ticino, a river of Gallia Cisalpina, rising in the Lepontine Alps, and running through the Lacus Verbanus, or Lago Maggiore, it to the Po. At the mouth of this river the Romans, under Cornelius Scipio, the father of Scipio Africanus the elder, were defeated by Hannibal.

TICITA, a mountain range of Campania, about a mile to the east of Capua. It was a branch of the Apennines, and now takes its name from the village of Maddaloni near Caserta. Liv. 23 46 et 49, 26, 9. Sil Ital. 12 456.

TIFERNUM, a town of Umbria, near the Metaurus, called hence, for distinction sake, Metaurense It is now St Angelo in Vado Plin 3, 14. ——A town of Umbria, towards the sources of the Tiber, and on the left bank of that river, distinguished from that circumstance by the epithet of Tiberinum Its site is thought to be occupied by the modern Città di Castello Plin Ep 4, 1. 10, 24 — A town of Samnium, supposed to have stood near the Ponte di Lamotano, on the right bank of the river Tifernus (now Biferno.) The mons Tifernus was near the source of the same river, above Bodano, and is now called Monte Matese.

TIFERNUS, a mountain of Campania Vid Tifernum

TIGELLINUS, SOSONIUS, a Roman celebrated for his intrigues and perfidy in the court of Nero. He was appointed judge at the trial of the conspirators who had leagued against Nero, for which he was liberally rewarded with triumphal honours He afterwards betrayed the emperor, and, on the accession of Galba, was ordered to destroy himself, 68, A D Tacit. Hist. 1, 72.—Plut. - Juv. 1

TIGELLIUS, M HERMOGENES, a native of Sardinia, who became the favourite of J Cæsar, of Cleopatra, and Augustus, by his mimicry and facetiousness He was celebrated for the melody of his voice, yet he was of a mean and ungenerous disposition, and of unpleasing manners, as Horace (Sat. 1, 2, 5, &c.) insinuates.

TIGRANES, a king of Armenia, who made himself master of Assyria and Cappadocia. He married Cleopatra, the daughter of Mithridates, and by the advice of his father in-law, he declared war against the Romans. He despised these distant enemies, and even ordered the head of the messenger to be cut off who first told him that the Roman general was boldly advancing towards his capital His pride, however, was soon abated; and though he ordered the Roman consul Lucullus to be brought alive into his presence, he fled with precipitation from his capital, and was soon after defeated near mount Taurus. This totally disheartened him; he refused to receive Mithridates into his palace, and even set a price upon his head. His mean submission to Pompey, the successor of Lucullus in Asia, and a bribe of 60,000 talents, insured him on his throne, and he received a garrison in his capital, and continued at peace with the Romans His second son of the same name revolted against him, and attempted to dethrone him with the assistance of the king of Parthia, whose daughter he had married. This did not succeed, and the son had recourse to the Romans, by whom he was put in possession of Sophene, while the father remained quiet on the throne of Armenia. The son was afterwards sent in chains to Rome, for his insolence to Pompey. Cic pro Man. Vit Mur. 5 1 — Paterc. 2. 33 et 37. Justin. 10, 1 et 2. Plut in Luc, Pomp &c ——A king of Armenia in the reign of Tiberius. He was put to death. Tacit Ann. 6. 40. ——One of the royal family of the Cappadocians, chosen by Tiberius to ascend the throne of Armenia.

TIGRANOCERTA, now Sert, the capital of Armenia, situate on the left bank of the river Nicephorius. It was built by Tigranes, who fortified it strongly, and peopled it chiefly with Greeks, whom he had forcibly carried hither from Asia Minor It was a wealthy and beautiful city, and was taken in the Mithridatic war by Lucullus, who completely sacked it, and allowed the Greek colonists to return to their own homes. Tacit. Ann 12 50 14, 24. Plin 6, 9.

TIGRIS, a large river of Asia, which rises in mount Niphates, and after forming the boundary between Mesopotamia and Assyria, as well as between Susiana and Babylonia, is joined by the Euphrates, and enters the Persian Gulf. Its course is nearly parallel with that of the Euphrates, but it is a much smaller river than the latter, being only 1000 miles long to its mouth in the gulf. It derives its name from the rapidity of its current, the word Tigr in Median, and Tur in Persian, signifying an arrow. From the upper part of it having been known by the appellation Diglito, as well as from other concurrent circumstances, it is supposed to be the same with the Hiddekel mentioned in Holy Writ as one of the rivers of Paradise Plin 6, 27 — Justin. 42, 3.—Lucan. 3, 256.—Mela, 1, 11. 3, 8. Virg Ecl 1, 63

TIGURINI, a warlike people among the Helvetii, now forming the modern cantons of Suri, Zurich, Schoffhausen and St Gall. Their capital was Tigurum, now Zurich. Liv. Epit. 65. - Cæs. B G. 1, 12 et 27

TIMACHUS, now the Timok, a river of Mœsia falling into the Danube Plin 3 26

TIMÆA, the wife of Agis, king of Sparta, was debauched by Alcibiades, by whom she had a son This child was rejected in the succession to the throne, though Agis, on his death-bed, declared him to be legitimate. Plut. in Ag

TIMÆUS, a friend of Alexander, who came to his assistance when he was alone surrounded by the Oxydracæ. He was killed in the encounter Curt 9, 5 ——An historian of Tauromenium in Sicily, who flourished about 262 B.C., and died in the 96th year of his age. His father's name was Andromachus. He was banished from Sicily by Agathocles. His general history of Sicily, and that of the wars of Pyrrhus, were in general esteem, and his authority was great, except when he treated of Agathocles. His compositions are lost. Plut. Nic. - Cic. Or 2.—A writer who published some treatises concerning ancient philosophers Diog. in Emp — A Pythagorean philosopher, born at Locri, B C. 360. He followed the doctrines of the founder of the metempsychosis, but in some parts of his system of the world he differed from him. He wrote a treatise on the nature and the soul of the world in the Doric dialect, still extant. Plato in Tim. — Plut. —A sophist, of the third century of our era, who wrote a book called Lexicon vocum Platonicarum. It was edited with great ability by Ruhnken. 8vo L. Bat 1754.

TIMAGENES, a Greek historian of Alexandria, 54 B. C. brought to Rome by Gabinius, and sold as a slave to Faustus, the son of Sylla. His great abilities procured him his liberty, and gained the favours of the great, and of Augustus. The emperor discarded him for his impertinence; and Timagenes, to revenge himself on his patron, burnt the interesting history which he had composed of his reign Plut. Horat. Ep 1, 19, 15. — Quintil 1, 10 —An historian and rhetorician of Miletus —A man who wrote an account of the life of Alexander. Curt 9, 5

TIMAGORAS, an Athenian, capitally punished by his countrymen, for paying homage to Darius, according to the Persian manner of kneeling on the ground, when he was sent to Persia as ambassador. Val Max. 6, 2. Vid Meles.

TIMANDRIDES, a Spartan celebrated for his virtues. Ælian V. H. 14, 31.

TIMANTHES, a painter of Sicyon, in the reign of Philip, the father of Alexander the Great. In his celebrated painting of Iphigenia going to be immolated, he represented all the attendants overwhelmed with grief; but his superior genius, by covering the face of Agamemnon, left to the conception of the imagination the deep sorrows of the father. He obtained a prize, for which the celebrated Parrhasius was a competitor This was in painting an Ajax with all the fury which his disappointment could occasion, when deprived of the arms of Achilles. Cic. de Orat. — Val Max 8 11.—Ælian V. H. 9, 11.

TIMARCHUS, a philosopher of Alexandria, intimate with Lamprocles, the disciple of Socrates Diog, 6 —A Cretan, accused before Nero of oppression. Tacit Ann 15, 20.—An officer in Ætolia, who burnt his ships to prevent the flight of his companions, and to ensure him self the victory. Polyæn. 5 —A king of Salamis.

TIMASITHEUS, a chief magistrate of Lipara, who prevailed upon his countrymen to spare some Romans whom they had piratically captured in a ship sent by the senate to make an offering of the spoils of Veii to the god of Delphi. He conveyed them to their place of destination in one of his own vessels, and assisted them in dedicating the gift. The Roman senate rewarded him very liberally, and 137 years after, when the Carthaginians were dispossessed of Lipara, the same generosity was nobly extended to his descendants in the island. Diod. 14 — Plut in Cam.

TIMAVUS, a celebrated stream of Italy, in the territory of Venetia, north-east of Aquileia, and falling into the Adriatic. Few streams have been more celebrated in antiquity, or more sung by the poets, than the Timavus. Its numerous sources, its lake and subterraneous passage, which have been the theme of the Latin muse from Virgil to Claudian and Ausonius, are now so little known, that their existence has even been questioned, and ascribed to poetical invention. It has, however, been well ascertained, that the name of Timavo is still preserved by some springs, which rise near S Giovanni di Carso and the castle of Duino, and form a river, which, after a course of little more than a mile, falls into the Adriatic. Strab. 5.—Virg. Ecl 8, 6. G. 3, 475. Æn. 1, 248 —Claudian. Bell. Get. 562.—Mart. 4, 25 5 8, 28, 7.

TIMOCLEA, a Theban lady, sister to Theogenes, who was killed at Cheronæa. One of Alexander's soldiers offered her violence, after which she led her ravisher to a well, and while he believed that immense treasures were concealed there, Timoclea threw him into it. Alexander commended her virtue, and forbade his soldiers to hurt the Theban females. Plut. in Alex.

TIMOCRATES, a Greek philosopher of uncommon austerity.

TIMOCREON, a comic poet of Rhodes, who obtained poetical, as well as gymnastic prizes at Olympia. He lived about 476 years before Christ, distinguished for his voracity, and for his resentment against Simonides and Themistocles

TIMOLEON, a celebrated Corinthian, son of Timodemus and Demariste. He was such an enemy to tyranny, that he did not hesitate to murder his own brother Timophanes, when he attempted, against his representations, to make himself absolute in Corinth. This was viewed with pleasure by the friends of liberty; but the mother of Timoleon conceived the most inveterate aversion for her son, and for ever banished him from her sight This proved painful to Timoleon, a settled melancholy dwelt upon his mind, and he refused to accept of any offices in the state. When the Syracusans, oppressed with the tyranny of Dionysius the younger, and of the Carthaginians, had solicited the assistance of the Corinthians, all looked upon Timoleon as a proper deliverer, but all applications would have been disregarded, if one of the magistrates had not awakened in him the sense of natural liberty. Timoleon says he, if you accept of the command of this expedition we will believe that you have killed a tyrant; but if not, we cannot but call you your brother's murderer. This had due effect, and Timoleon sailed for Syracuse in ten ships, accompanied by about 1000 men. The Carthaginians attempted to oppose him, but Timoleon eluded their vigilance Icetas, who had the possession of the city, was defeated and Dionysius, who despaired of success, gave himself up into the hands of the Corinthian general. This success gained Timoleon adherents in Sicily, many cities which hitherto had looked upon him as an impostor, claimed his protection, and when he was at last master of Syracuse by the total overthrow of Icetas, and of the Carthaginians, he razed the citadel which had been the seat of tyranny, and erected on the spot a common hall Syracuse was almost destitute of inhabitants, and at the solicitation of Timoleon, a Corinthian colony was sent to Sicily; the lands were equally divided among the citizens, and the houses were sold for a thousand talents, which were appropriated to the use of the state, and deposited in the treasury When Syracuse was thus delivered from tyranny, the conqueror extended his benevolence to the other states of Sicily, and all the petty tyrants were reduced and banished from the island A code of salutary laws was framed for the Syracusans; and the armies of Carthage, which had attempted again to raise commotions in Sicily were defeated, and peace was at last re-established. The gratitude of the Sicilians was shown every where to their deliverer. Timoleon was received with repeated applause in the public assemblies, and though a private man, unconnected with the government, he continued to enjoy his former influence at Syracuse; his advice was consulted on matters of importance, and his authority respected. He ridiculed the accusations of malevolence, and when some informers had charged him with oppression, he rebuked the Syracusans who were going to put the accusers to immediate death. A remarkable instance of his providential escape from the dagger of an assassin has been recorded by one of his biographers. As he was going to offer a sacrifice to the gods after a victory, two assassins, sent by the enemies, approached his person in disguise. The arm of one of the assassins was already lifted up, when he was suddenly stabbed by an unknown person who made his escape from the camp. The other assassin, struck at the fall of his companion, fell before Timoleon, and confessed, in the presence of the army, the conspiracy that had been formed against his life. The unknown assassin was in the mean time pursued, and when he was found, he declared, that he had committed no crime in avenging the death of a beloved father, whom the man he had stabbed had murdered in the town of Leontini. Enquiries were made, and his confessions were found to be true. Timoleon died at Syracuse about 337 years before the Christian era. His body received an honourable burial, in a public place called from him Timoleonteum, but the tears of a grateful nation were more convincing proofs of the public regret, than the institution of festivals and games yearly to be observed on the day of his death. C. Nep. et Plut. in vita.

TIMOMACHUS, a painter of Byzantium, in the age of Sylla and Marius. His painting of Medea murdering her children, and his Ajax, were purchased for eighty talents by Julius Cæsar, and deposited in the temple of Venus at Rome. Plin. 35, 11.

TIMON, a native of Athens, called Misanthropus, for his unconquerable aversion to mankind and to all society. He was fond of Apemantus another Athenian, whose character was similar to his own, and he said that he had some partiality for Alcibiades, because he was one day to be his country's ruin. Once he went into the public assembly, and told his countrymen that he had a fig-tree on which many had ended their life with a halter, and that as he was going to cut it down to raise a building on the spot, he advised all such as were inclined to destroy themselves, to hasten and go and hang themselves in his garden. Plut in Alc. &c.—Lucian in Tim.—Paus 6, 12. —A Greek poet, son of Timarchus, in the age of Ptolemy Philadelphus. He wrote several dramatic pieces, all now lost, and died in the 90th year of his age. Diog. 9.—Athen 6 et 13.—A disciple of Pyrrho, who flourished in the time of Ptolemy Philadelphus, and lived to the age of 90 years. He had a school at Athens; but led so debauched a life, that he once held a contest with several hard drinkers, and came off victorious. He wrote a satirical poem against the whole body of philosophers, fragments of which are extant.

TIMOPHANES a Corinthian, brother to Timoleon. He attempted to make himself tyrant of his country, by means of the mercenary soldiers with whom he had fought against the Argives and Cleomenes. Timoleon wished to convince him of the impropriety of his measures, and when he found him unmoved, he caused him to be assassinated. Plut. et C. Nep. in Tim.

TIMOTHEUS, a poet and musician of Miletus, son of Thersander or Philopolis. He was received with hisses the first time he exhibited as musician in the assembly of the people; and further applications would have totally been abandoned, had not Euripides discovered his abilities, and encouraged him to follow a profession in which he afterwards gained so much applause. He received the immense sum of 1000 pieces of gold from the Ephesians, because he had composed a poem in honour of Diana. He died about the 90th year of his age, two years before the birth of Alexander the Great. There was also another musician of Beotia in the age of Alexander, often confounded with the musician of Miletus. He was a great favourite of the conqueror of Darius. Cic. de Leg. 2, 15.—Paus. 8, 12.—Plut. de musc. de fort. &c.—An Athenian general, son of Conon. He signalled himself by his valour and magnanimity, and showed that he was not inferior to his great father in military prudence. He seized Corcyra, and obtained several victories over the Thebans, but his ill success in one of his expeditions disgusted the Athenians, and Timotheus, like the rest of his noble predecessors, was fined a large sum of money. He retired to Chalcis, where he died. He was so disinterested, that he never appropriated any of the plunder to his own use, but after one of his expeditions, he filled the treasury of Athens with 1200 talents. Some of the ancients, to imitate his continual successes, have represented him sleeping by the side of Fortune, while the goddess drove cities into his net. He was intimate with Plato, at whose table he learned temperance and moderation. Paus. 1, 29.—Plut. in Syll. &c.—Ælian. V. H. 2, 10 et 18. 3, 19.—C. Nep.

TINGIS, now Tangier, the metropolis of Mauritania Tingitana, on the north-western coast of Africa, and a short distance to the east of the Ampelusian promontory. It was so ancient that it was said in mythology to have been built by the giant Antæus or, as others maintain, by Sophax, the son of Hercules by Tinge, whom the hero married after the death of Antæus. It was taken by Sertorius, who caused the tomb of the founder to be opened, and discovered in it a skeleton reported to be sixty cubits long; there was also a buckler found, which had been cut out of the hide of an elephant, and was so large that no man then living could wield it. These traditions caused the inhabitants to hold their city in great veneration. Plut. in Sert.—Mela, 1, 5. Plin 5, 1.

TIPHYS, the pilot of the ship of the Argonauts, was son of Hagnius, or, according to some, of Phorbas. He died before the Argonauts reached Colchis, at the court of Lycus in the Propontis, and Erginus was chosen in his place. Orph. Apollod. 1, 9. Apollon. Val. Flacc.—Paus 9, 32.—Hygin. fab 14 et 18.

TIRESIAS, a celebrated prophet of Thebes, son of Everus and Chariclo. He lived to a great age, which some authors have called as long as seven generations of men, others six, and others nine, during the time that Polydorus, Labdacus, Laius, Œdipus, and his sons, sat on the throne of Thebes. It is said that in his youth he found two serpents in the act of coputation on mount Cyllene, and that when he had struck them with a stick to separate them, he found himself suddenly changed into a girl. Seven years after he found again some serpents together in the same manner, and he recovered his original sex, by striking them a second time with his wand. When he was a woman, Tiresias had married, and it was from those reasons, according to some of the ancients, that Jupiter and Juno referred to his decision a dispute, in which the deities wished to know which of the sexes received greater pleasure from the connubial state. Tiresias, who could speak from actual experience, decided in favour of Jupiter, and declared, that the pleasure which the female received was ten times greater than that of the male. Juno, who supported a different opinion, and gave the superiority to the male sex, punished Tiresias by depriving him of his eye-sight. But this dreadful loss was in some measure repaired by the humanity of Jupiter, who bestowed upon him the gift of prophecy, and permitted him to live seven times more than the rest of men. These causes of the blindness of Tiresias, which are supported by the authority of Ovid, Hyginus, and others, are contradicted by Apollodorus, Callimachus, Propertius, &c., who declare that this was inflicted upon him as a punishment, because he had seen Minerva bathing in the fountain Hippocrene, on mount Helicon. Chariclo, who accompanied Minerva, complained of the severity with which her son was treated, but the goddess, who well knew that this was the irrevocable punishment inflicted by Saturn on such mortals as fix their eyes upon a goddess without her consent, alleviated the misfortunes of Tiresias, by making him acquainted with futurity, and giving him a staff which could conduct his steps with as much safety as if he had the use of his eye-sight. During his life-time, Tiresias was an infallible oracle to all Greece. The generals, during the Theban war, consulted him, and found his predictions verified. He drew his prophecies sometimes from the flight or the language of birds in which he was assisted by his daughter Manto, and sometimes he drew the manes from the infernal regions to know futurity with mystical ceremonies. He at last died, after drinking the waters of a cold fountain, which froze his blood. He was buried with great pomp by the Thebans on mount Tilphussius, and honoured as a god. His oracle at Orchomenus was in universal esteem. Homer represents Ulysses as going to the infernal regions to consult Tiresias concerning his return to Ithaca. Apollod. 3. 6.—*Theocrit. TIRIDATES, a monarch of Parthia, raised to the throne after Phraates had been expelled for his cruelty and oppression. Tiridates, however upon learning that Phraates was marching against him with a numerous army of Scythians, fled with the infant son of Phraates to Augustus. Augustus restored his son to Phraates, but refused to deliver up Tiridates. Horat. Od 1, 26.——A king of Armenia, in the reign of Nero.

TIRO TULLIUS, the slave, and afterwards the freedman of Cicero, greatly esteemed by his master for his learning and good qualities. It is said that he invented short hand writing among the Romans. He wrote the life of Cicero, and other treatises now lost. Cic ad Att. &c.

TIRYNS, or Tirynthus, a city of Argolis, south-east of Argos, and about twelve stadia from Nauplia. It is said to have been founded by king Proetus, and was celebrated as the early residence of Hercules till he killed Iphitus, and fled hence into the Trachinian country. The Tirynthian citadel, said to have been called Licymnia, from Licymnus, a son of Electryon and brother of Alcmena, was defended by massive walls of gigantic structure, built by workmen from Lycia. These are the Cyclopes, who also built the treasury at Athens, as well as parts of Argos, Mycenæ, and the Boeotian Orchomenus. They appear to have been altogether different from the fabulous giants of Homer, and to have derived their name from the vast size of the materials they employed. They were said by some to have been Phœnicians, but others again have supposed they were Egyptians, from the similarity subsisting between their works and the colossal remains of the latter people. Strab 8.—Pans 2, 16 et 25.—*Hes Here. TIRYNTHIA, a name given to Alcmena, because she lived at Tirynthus. Ovid Met. 6.

TISAMENUS or TISAMENUS, a son of Orestes and Hermione, the daughter of Menelaus, who succeeded on the throne of Argos and Lacedæmon. The Heraclidæ entered his kingdom in the third year of his reign, and he was obliged to retire with his family into Achaia. He was some time after killed in a battle against the Ionians, near Helice. Apollod 2, 7.—Paus 3, 1. 7, 1.——A king of Thebes, son of Thersander, and grandson of Polynices. The Furies, who continually persecuted the house of Œdipus, permitted him to live in tranquility but they tormented his son and successor Autesion, and obliged him to retire to Doris. Paus 1. 5. 9. 6.

TISANDRUS, one of the Greeks concealed with Ulysses in the wooden horse. Some suppose him to be the same as Thersander, the son of Polynices. Virg. Æn. 2, 261.

TISIDRIS. Vid Tydrus.

TISIPHONE, one of the Furies daughter of Nox and Acheron who was the minister of divine vengeance upon mankind, and visited them with plagues and diseases, and punished the wicked in Tartarus. She was represented with a whip in her hand, serpents hung from her head, and were wreathed round her arms instead of bracelets. By Juno's direction she attempted to prevent the landing of Io in Egypt, but the god of the Nile repelled her, and obliged her to return to hell. Stat. Theb. 1, 59. Virg. G 3, 552. Ov 6, 555.—Horat. Sat 1, 8, 35.

TISSAPHERNES, an officer of Darius.——A satrap of Persia, commander of the forces of Artaxerxes, at the battle of Cunaxa against Cyrus. It was by his valour and intrepidity that the king's forces gained the victory, and for this he obtained the daughter of Artaxerxes in marriage, and all the provinces of which Cyrus was governor. His popularity did not long continue, and the king ordered him to be put to death when he had been conquered by Agesilaus, 395 B.C. C Nep TITÆA, the mother of the Titans. She is supposed to be the same as Thea, Rhea, Terra, &c.

TITAN, or TITANUS, a son of Cœlus and Terra, brother to Saturn and Hyperion. He was the eldest of the children of Cœlus, but he gave his brother Saturn the kingdom of the world, provided he raised no male children. When the birth of Jupiter was concealed, Titan made war against Saturn, and with the assistance of his brothers, the Titans, he imprisoned him till he was replaced on the throne by his son Jupiter. This tradition is recorded by Lactantius, a Christian writer, who took it from the dramatic compositions of Ennius, now lost. None of the ancient mythologists, such as Apollodorus, Hesiod, Hyginus &c. have made mention of Titan. Titan is a name applied to Saturn by Orpheus and Lucian; to the sun by Virgil and Ovid, and to Prometheus by Juvenal. Ovid. Met. 1, 10.—Juv. 14, 35.—Pers. 2, 11.—Orpheus Hymn 13.—Virg. Æn. 4, 119.

TITANES, a name given to the sons of Cœlus and Terra. They were 45 in number, according to the Egyptians. Apollodorus mentions 13, Hyginus 6, and Hesiod 20, among whom are three Titanesses. The most known of the Titans are Saturn, Hyperion, Oceanus, Iapetus, Cottus and Briareus, to whom Horace adds Typhœus, Mimas, Porphyrion, Rhœtus, and Enceladus, who are by other mythologists reckoned among the giants. They were all of a gigantic stature and with proportionable strength. They were treated with great cruelty by Cœlus, and confined in the bowels of the earth, till their mother pitied their misfortunes, and armed them against their father. Saturn, with a scythe, cut off the genitals of his father, as he was going to unite himself to Terra, and threw them into the sea, and from the froth sprang a new deity, called Venus; as also Alecto, Tisiphone, and Megæra, according to Apollodorus. When Saturn succeeded his father, he married Rhea, but he devoured all his male children, as he had been informed by an oracle, that he should be dethroned by them as a punishment for his cruelty to his father. The wars of the Titans against the gods are very celebrated in mythology. They are often confounded with that of the giants, but it is to be observed, that the war of the Titans was against Saturn, and that of the giants against Jupiter. Hesiod. Theog. 133, &c.—Apollod. 1, 1.—Eschyl. in Prom.—Callim. in Del. 17.—Diod. 1.—Hygen. præf fab.

TITANIA, a patronymic applied to Pyrrha, as grand-daughter of Titan, and likewise to Diana. Ovid. Met. 1, 315. 2, &c.

TITANIDES, the daughters of Cœlus and Terra: reduced in number to six, according to Hesiod, or to seven, according to Orpheus. The most celebrated were Tethys, Themis, Dione, Thea, Mnemosyne, Ops Cybele, Vesta, Phœbe, and Rhea. Hesiod Theog. 135, &c.—Apollod. 1, 1.

TITARESIUS, a river of Thessaly, called also Furious, flowing into the Peneus a little above the vale of Tempe. The waters of the two rivers did not, however mingle, as those of the Peneus were clear and limpid, while those of the Titaresius were impregnated with a thick unctuous substance which floated like oil upon the surface. Hence the fabulous account of its being a branch of the infernal Styx. It is now the Saranto Poros. Strab. 9.—Hom. Il. 2, 751.—Lucan. 6, 376.

TITHENIDIA, a festival of Sparta, in which nurses carried, conveyed male infants entrusted to their charge, to the temple of Diana, where they sacrificed young pigs. During the time of the solemnity, they generally danced and exposed themselves in ridiculous postures, there were also some entertainments given near the temple, where tents were erected. Each had a separate portion allotted him, together with a small loaf, a piece of new cheese, part of the entrails of the victim and figs, beans, and green vetches instead of sweetmeats.

TITHONUS, a son of Laomedon, king of Troy, by Strymo, the daughter of the Scamander. He was so beautiful that Aurora became enamoured of him, and carried him away. He had by her Memnon and Emathion. He begged of Aurora to be immortal, and the goddess granted it, but as he had forgotten to ask the vigour, youth, and beauty which he then enjoyed, he soon grew old, infirm and decrepit, and as life became insupportable to him, he prayed Aurora to remove him from the world. As he could not die, the goddess changed him into a cicada, or grasshopper. Apollod. 3, 5.—Virg. G. 1, 447. Æn. 4, 585. 8, 3.4. Hesiod Theog. 984.—Ovid Fast. 1, 461. 3, 403.—Horat Od 1, 28. 2, 16.

TITHOREA, a city on mount Parnassus, called also Neon, for the name of Tithorea was only properly applied to one of the peaks of Parnassus. This place was taken and burnt by the army of Xerxes. In its vicinity, Dromachetes, the Phocian general, was defeated and slain by the Thebans. The ruins of Tithorea are to be seen near the modern village of Velitza. Herod. 8, 32 et 33.—Paus. 10, 2.

TITHRAUSTES, a Persian satrap, B.C. 395, ordered to murder Tissaphernes by Artaxerxes. He succeeded to the offices which the slaughtered favourite enjoyed. He was defeated by the Athenians under Conon.——An officer in the Persian court, &c. The name was common to some of the superior officers of state in the court of Artaxerxes. Plut.—C. Nep. in Dat et Conon.

TITIA LEX de magistratibus, by P. Titius, the tribune, A.U.C. 710. It ordained that a triumvirate of magistrates should be invested with consular power to preside over the republic for five years. The persons chosen were Octavius, Antony, and Lepidus.——Another, de provinciis, which required that the provincial quæstors like the consuls and prætors, should receive their provinces by lot.

TITIANUS, Julianus, a Latin geographical writer, who flourished about the commencement of the third century.——Attil. a noble Roman, put to death A.D. 156, by the senate for aspiring to the purple. He was the only one proscribed during the reign of Antoninus Pius.

TITIUS PROCULUS, a Roman knight, appointed to watch Messalina. Tacit Ann. 11, 37.——Septimius, a poet in the Augustan age, who distinguished himself by his lyric and tragic compositions, now lost. Horat Ep. 1, 3. 9.

TITORMUS a shepherd of Æthalia, called another Hercules, on account of his prodigious strength. He was stronger than his contemporary Milo of Crotona as he could lift on his shoulders a stone which the Crotonian could even with difficulty. Ælian. V. H. 12, 22.—Herod. 6, 127.

TITURIUS, a friend of Julia Silana, who informed against Agrippina, &c. Tacit Ann. 13

—A lieutenant of Cæsar in Gaul, killed by Ambiorix. Cæs. B. G. 5, 29, &c.

TITUS VESPASIANUS, son of Vespasian and Flavia Domitilla, became known by his valour in the Roman armies, particularly at the siege of Jerusalem. In the 79th year of the Christian æra, he was invested with the imperial purple, and the Roman people had every reason to expect in him the barbarities of a Tiberius, and the debaucheries of a Nero. While in the house of Vespasian, Titus had been distinguished for his extravagance and incontinence; his attendants were the most abandoned and dissolute; and it seemed that he wished to be superior to the rest of the world in the gratification of every impure desire, and in every unnatural vice. From such a private character, which still might be curbed by the authority and example of a father, what could be expected but tyranny and oppression? Yet Titus became a model of virtue, and in an age and office in which others wish to gratify all their appetites, the emperor abandoned his usual profligacy, he forgot his debaucheries, and Bernice, whom he had loved with uncommon ardour, even to render himself despised by the Roman people, was dismissed from his presence. When raised to the throne, he thought himself bound to be the father of his people, the guardian of virtue, and the patron of liberty; and Titus is, perhaps, the only monarch who, when invested with uncontrollable power, bade adieu to those vices, those luxuries and indulgencies, which as a private man he never ceased to gratify. He was moderate in his entertainments, and though he often refused the donations which were due to sovereignty, no emperor was ever more generous and magnificent than Titus. All informers were banished from his presence, and even severely punished. A reform was made in the judicial proceedings, and trials were no longer permitted to be postponed for years. The public edifices were repaired, and baths were erected for the convenience of the people. Spectacles were exhibited, and the Roman populace were gratified with the sight of a naval combat in the ancient naumachia, and the sudden appearance of 5000 wild beasts brought into the circus for their amusement. To do good to his subjects was the ambition of Titus, and it was at the recollection that he had done no service, or granted no favour one day, that he exclaimed in the memorable words of My friends, I have lost a day! A continual wish to be benevolent and kind, made him popular; and it will not be wondered, that he who could say that he had rather die himself, than be the cause of the destruction of one of his subjects, was called the love and delight of mankind. Two of the senators conspired against his life, but the emperor disregarded their attempts, he made them his friends by kindness, and like another Nero, presented them with a sword to destroy him. During his reign, Rome was three days on fire, the towns of Campania were destroyed by an eruption of Vesuvius, and the empire was visited by a pestilence which carried away an infinite number of inhabitants. In this time of public calamity, the emperor's benevolence and philanthropy were conspicuous. Titus comforted the afflicted as a father, he alleviated their distresses by his liberal bounties, and as if they were but one family, he exerted himself for the good and preservation of the whole. The Romans, however, had not long to enjoy the favours of this magnificent prince. Titus was taken ill, and as he retired into the country of the Sabines to his father's house, his indisposition was increased by a burning fever. He lifted his eyes to heaven, and with modest submission complained of the severity of fate which removed him from the world when young, where he had been employed in making a grateful people happy. He died the 13th of September, A.D. 81, in the 41st year of his age, after a reign of two years two months and twenty days. The news of his death was received with lamentations; Rome was filled with tears and all looked upon themselves as deprived of the most benevolent of fathers. After him Domitian ascended the throne, not without incurring the suspicion of having hastened his brother's end, by ordering him to be placed, during his agony, in a tub full of snow, where he expired. Domitian has also been accused of raising commotions, and of making attempts to dethrone his brother, but Titus disregarded them, and forgave the offender. Some authors have reflected with severity upon the cruelties which Titus exercised against the Jews; but though certainly a disgrace to the benevolent features of his character, we must consider him as an instrument in the hands of Providence, exerted for the punishment of a wicked and infatuated people. Joseph B. J. 7, 16, &c — Suet. — Dio &c

TITUS, TARIUS, a king of the Sabines. [Vid Tatius.]——Livius, a celebrated historian. [Vid Livius.]——A son of Junius Brutus, put to death by order of his father, for conspiring to restore the Tarquins.

TITYRUS, a shepherd introduced in Virgil's eclogues, &c——A promontory on the western coast of Crete, called by Ptolemy Psacum and now Capo Spada.

TITYUS, a celebrated giant, son of Terra, or, according to others, of Jupiter, by Elara, the daughter of Orchomenos. He was of such a prodigious size, that his mother died in travail after Jupiter had drawn her from the bowels of the earth, where she had been concealed during her pregnancy to avoid the anger of Juno. His portentous appearance rendered him powerful, and Juno, who was jealous of Jupiter's amours with Latona, employed the strength of Tityus to bring her rival into her presence, but the attempt was resented by the god, who hurled the ravisher into Tartarus. According, however, to the more received opinion, Tityus became enamoured of Latona, and attempted to offer violence to her, but the goddess delivered herself from his importunities, by calling to her assistance her children, who killed the giant with their arrows. He was placed in hell, where a serpent continually devoured his liver; or, according to others, where vultures perpetually fed upon his entrails, which grew again as soon as devoured. It is said that Tityus covered nine acres when stretched on the ground. He had a small chapel with an altar in the island of Rubœa. Apollod. 1, 4.—, Pind. Pyth. 4.—Homer. Od. 7, 325. 1. 11, 575.—, Apollon. Rh. 1, 182, &c. Virg Æn. 6, 523 — Horat. Od 3, 1, 77 —Hygin. fab. 55.—Ovid. Met. 4, 457 Tibull. 1, 3, 75

TLEPOLEMUS, a son of Hercules and Astyochia, born at Argos. He left his native country after the accidental murder of Licymnius and retired to Rhodes, by order of the oracle, where he was chosen king, as being one of the sons of Hercules. He left his kingdom to the care of Butes, and went to the Trojan war with nine ships, and was killed by Sarpedon. There were some festivals established at Rhodes in his honour, called Tlepolemia, in which men and boys contended. The victors were rewarded with poplar crowns Apollod 2, 7.—Hygin fab. 97.——One of Alexander's generals, who obtained Carmania at the general division of the Macedonian empire. Diod 18.——An Egyptian general, who flourished B.C. 207

TMARUS, a Rutulian in the wars of Æneas. Virg Æn 9, 685.——A mountain of Epirus. Vid Tomarus.

TMOLUS, a king of Lydia, who married Omphale and was son of Sipylus and Chthonia He offered violence to a young nymph called Arriphe, at the foot of Diana's altar, for which impiety he was afterwards killed by a bull. The mountain on which he was buried bore his name. Apollod. 2, 6. Ovid. Met. 11, 4 —Hygin. fab. 191.— A mountain of Lydia, which sends several tributary torrents into the Hermus on the one side, and into the Cayster on the other, and divides, in fact, the valleys through which those two rivers flow It was said to derive its name from Tmolus, a Lydian king, having been previously called Carmanorius. This mountain was much celebrated for its wine. Hence the frequent reference to it in the Bacchæ of Euripides. It appears also to have abounded with shrubs and evergreens, nor was it less noted for its mineral productions. It yielded tin, and Pactolus washed from its cavities a rich supply of golden ore. Its modern appellation is Bouz Dagh. Liv 5 29.—Virg. G. 2, 98 Senec Phæn. 602.—Ovid. Met 6, 15. Eurip. Bacch. 55 et 65.—*Gallim. TOLOSA, now Toulouse, a town of Gallia Narbonensis, which became a Roman colony under Augustus, and was afterwards celebrated for the cultivation of the sciences. Minerva had a rich temple there, which Cæpio the consul plundered, and as he was never after fortunate, the words aurum Tolosanum became proverbial. Cæs B G. Mela, 2, 5.—Cic. de Nat. D 3, 20.

TOLUMNIUS, an augur in the army of Turnus against Æneas. Virg. Æn 11, 429.——A king of Veii, killed by Cor. Cossus after he had ordered the ambassadors of Rome to be assassinated. Liv. 4, 19.

TOLUS, a man whose head was found in digging for the foundation of the capitol, in the reign of Tarquin, whence the Romans concluded that their city should become the head or mistress of the world.

TOMARUS or TMARUS a mountain of Epirus, on the declivity, or at the foot of which, stood the celebrated Dodona Strab 7.

TOMOS, or TOMI, now Tomiswar, or Baba, a town situate on the western shores of the Euxine sea, about thirty-six miles below the mouth of the Danube. The word is derived from τέμνω, seco, because Medea, as it is said, cut to pieces the body of her brother Absyrtus there. It is celebrated as being the place where Ovid was banished by Augustus Tomos was the capital of what the Romans called the province of Scythia, and was said to have been founded by a Milesian colony, B C. 631. Strab. 7.—Apollod. 1, 9.—Mela, 2, 2.—Ovid ex Pont. 4, 14, 39. Trist. 3, 9, 33, &c.

TOMYRIS. Vid. Thomyris.

TONEA, a solemnity observed at Samos. It was usual to carry Juno's statue to the sea shore, and to offer cakes before it, and afterwards to replace it again in the temple This was in commemoration of the theft of the Tyrrhenians, who attempted to carry away the statue of the goddess, but were detained in the harbour by an invisible force.

TOPAZOS, an island on the western side of the Sinus Arabicus, in what was called the Sinus Immundus, and not far to the south of Berenice. It was called also Ophiodes, from its containing many serpents. The stone topazus was found here, whence the appellation given to the island. Diod 3, 40.—Plin. 6, 20, 37, 8.

TORONE, a town of Macedonia, situate towards the southern extremity of the Sithonian peninsula, and giving name to the Sinus Toronaicus, or gulf of Cassandria. The harbour of Torone was named Cophos, from the circumstance that the noise of waves was never heard there; hence the proverb κωφότερος τοῦ Τορωναίου λιμένος. Strab. Epit. 7. Mela, 2, 3.

TORQUATA one of the vestal virgins, daughter of C. Silanus She was a vestal for sixty-four years Tacit. Ann. 3, 69.

TORQUATUS, a surname of Titus Manlius Vid Manlius.

TORYNE, or TORONE, a haven of Epirus, below the river Thyamis, and opposite Coreyra. Here the fleet of Augustus anchored, prior to the battle of Actium. Plut. in Anton.—Pitt.

TRABEA, Q., a comic poet at Rome, in the age of Regulus, highly esteemed and ranked in merit next to Terence and Turpilius. Only eight lines remain of his poetry collected in the Corpus Poetarum Cic. in Tusc. 4, 31.—Fin. 2, 4

TRACHALUS M. GALERIUS, a consul in the reign of Nero, celebrated for his eloquence as an orator, and for a majestic and commanding aspect. Quintil 10, 1.—Tacit

TRACHIS, TRACHIN, or TRECHIN, a town of Thessaly in the Melian district and near the shore of the Sinus Maliacus. It was to this place that Hercules retired, after having committed an involuntary murder, as we learn from Sophocles, who has made it the scene of one of his deepest tragedies. Trachis, so called from the mountainous character of the country, forms the approach to Thermopylæ, on the side of Thessaly. Thucydides states that in the sixth year of the Peloponnesian war, B C 426, the Lacedæmonians, at the request of the Trachinians, who were harassed by the mountaineers of Œta, sent a colony into their country. These, jointly with the Trachinians built a town to which the name of Heraclea was given, distant about sixty stadia from Thermopylæ, and twenty from the sea. Its distance from Trachis was only six stadia. [Vid Heraclea.] Hom Il 2, 682 Soph Trach 39 Herod. 7, 176. Thucyd. 3, 92. Strab. 9.

TRACHONITIS, a part of Judæa, on the other side of the Jordan, on the northern confines of Palestine It abounds with rocks, which afforded shelter to numerous thieves and robbers Plin. 5, 14.

TRAJANOPOLIS, a city of Thrace, situated on the right bank of the Hebrus about 20 miles from its mouth. It is now Drachoro. Ptol —— A city of Silicia, the same as Selinus. Vid Selinus.

TRAJANUS, M. ULPIUS CRINITUS, a Roman emperor, born at Italica in Spain. His great virtues, and his private as well as public character, and his services in the empire, both as an officer, a governor, and a consul, recommended him to the notice of Nerva, who solemnly adopted him as his son, invested him during his life-time with the imperial purple, and gave him the name of Cæsar and of Germanicus. A little time after Nerva died, and the election of Trajan to the vacant throne was confirmed by the unanimous rejoicings of the people, and the free concurrence of the armies on the confines of Germany and the banks of the Danube The noble and independent behaviour of Trajan evinced the propriety and goodness of Nerva's choice, and the attachment of the legions, and the new emperor seemed calculated to ensure peace and domestic tranquillity to the extensive empire of Rome All the actions of Trajan showed a good and benevolent prince, whose virtues truly merited the encomiums which the pen of an elegant and courteous panegyrist has paid. The barbarians contented quiet, and the hostilities which they generally displayed at the election of a new emperor whose military abilities they distrusted, were now few. Trajan, however, could not behold with satisfaction and unconcern, the insolence of the Dacians, who claimed from the Roman people a tribute which the cowardice of Domitian had offered. The sudden appearance of the emperor on the frontiers awed the barbarians to peace; but Decebalus, their warlike monarch, soon began hostilities by violating the treaty. The emperor entered the enemy's country, by throwing a bridge across the rapid stream of the Danube, and a battle was fought in which the slaughter was so great, that in the Roman camp linen was wanted to dress the wounds of the soldiers Trajan obtained the victory, and Decebalus despairing of success destroyed himself, and Dacia became a province of Rome That the ardour of the Roman soldiers in defeating their enemies might not cool an expedition was undertaken into the east, and Parthia threatened with immediate war. Trajan passed through the submissive kingdom of Armenia, and by his well directed operations, made himself master of the provinces of Assyria and Mesopotamia. He extended his conquests as far as [illegible], he obtained victories over unknown nations, and when on the extremities of India he lamented that he possessed not the valour and youth of an Alexander, that he might add unexplored provinces and kingdoms to the Roman empire. These successes in different parts of the world gained applause, and the senators were profuse in the honours they decreed to the conqueror Thus, however, was but the blaze of transient glory. Trajan had no sooner signified his intentions of returning to Italy, than the conquered barbarians appeared again in arms, and the Roman emperor did not acquire one single acre of territory from the conquests of her sovereign in the east. The return of the emperor towards Rome was hastened by indisposition, he stopped in Cilicia and in the town of Selinus, which afterwards was called Trajanopolis, he was seized with a flux, and a few days after expired, in the beginning of August, A D 117, after a reign of 19 years, six months and 15 days, in the 64th year of his age. He was succeeded on the throne by Adrian, whom the empress Plotina introduced to the Roman armies, as the adopted son of her husband. The ashes of Trajan were carried to Rome, and deposited under the stately column which he had erected a few years before Under this emperor the Romans enjoyed tranquillity, and for a moment supposed that their prosperity was complete under a good and virtuous sovereign Trajan was fond of popularity, and he merited it. The sounding titles of Optimus, and the father of his country, were not unworthily bestowed upon a prince who was equal to the greatest generals of antiquity, and who, to indicate his affability, and his wish to listen to the just complaints of his subjects, distinguished his palace by the inscription of the public palace. Like other emperors he did not receive with an air of unconcern the homage of his friends, but rose from his seat and went cordially to salute them. He refused the statues which the flattery of favourites wished to erect to him, and he ridiculed the follies of an enlightened nation, that could pay adoration to cold inanimate pieces of marble His public entry into Rome gained him the hearts of the people, he appeared on foot, and showed himself an enemy to parade, and an ostentatious equipage. When in his camp he exposed himself to the fatigues of war, like the meanest soldier, and crossed the most barren deserts and extensive plains on foot and in his dress and food displayed all the simplicity which once gained the approbation of the Romans in their countryman Fabricius. All the oldest soldiers he knew by their own names, he conversed with them with the greatest familiarity, and never retired to his tent before he had visited the camp, and by a personal attendance convinced himself of the vigilance and the security of his army As a friend he was not less distinguished than as a general. He had a select number of intimates, whom he visited with freedom and openness, and at whose tables he partook many a moderate repast without form or ceremony. His confidence, however, in the good intentions of others was, perhaps carried to excess. His favourite Sura had once been accused of attempts upon his life, but Trajan disregarded the informer, and as he was that same day invited to the house of the supposed conspirator, he went thither early To try further the sincerity of Sura, he ordered himself to be shaved by his barber, to have a medicinal application made to his eyes by the hand of his surgeon, and to bathe together with him. The public works of Trajan are also celebrated; he opened free and easy communications between the cities of his provinces, he planted many colonies, and furnished Rome with all the corn and provisions which could prevent a famine in the time of calamity. It was by his directions, that the architect Apollodorus built that celebrated column which is still to be seen at Rome, under the name of Trajan's column. The area on which it stands was made by the labours of men, and the height of the pillar proves that a large hill 144 feet high was removed at a great expense. A.D. 114, to commemorate the victories of the reigning prince. His persecutions of the Christians were stopped by the interference of the humane Pliny, but he was uncommonly severe upon the Jews, who had barbarously murdered 200,000 of his subjects, and even fed upon the flesh of the dead. His vices have been obscured by seen through a reign of continued splendour and popularity, yet he is accused of incontinence and many unnatural indulgences. He was too much addicted to drinking, and his wish to be styled lord has been censured by those who admired the dissimulated moderation, and the modest claims of an Augustus. *Plin. Panegyr. &c — Dio. Cass. — Eutrop. — Aurelius — Spartian. — Joseph. Bell. TRAJECTUS RHENI, now Utrecht, the capital of one of the provinces of Holland.

TRALLES now Ghinzel-hesar, a town of Lydia, a little to the east of Magnesia ad Meandrum. It was said to have been founded by some Argives, together with a body of Thracians, from whom it took the name of Tralles. It had previously borne those of Anthea, Eyrinna, Charax, Seleucia, and Antiochia. Its shape was that of a trapezium, and it was defended by a citadel, and other forts. Strab. 14. — Plin. 5, 29.

TRANSTIBERINA, a part of the city of Rome, on one side of the Tiber. Mount Vatican was in that part of the city. Martial 1, 109.

TRAPEZUS now Trebisond, a city on the north-eastern coast of Pontus, founded by a colony from Sinope. It obtained its name from the mathematical figure in which it was built, and was remarkable as the first friendly spot reached by the 10 000 Greeks during their masterly retreat from Cunaxa. Trapezus was a magnificent city, and became very famous under the emperors of the eastern empire, who made it their capital. Xen. Anab. 4, 7. — Mela, 1, 19. — Plin. 6, 4. — A city of Arcadia, in the south-western angle of the country, and between the Achelous and Alpheus. Paus. 8, 27 et 28.

TRASIMENUS Vid. Thrasymenus.

TRAULUS MONTANUS, a Roman knight one of Messalina's favourites, put to death by Claudius. Tacit. Ann. 11, 36.

TREBIA, a town of the Sabines near the source of the Anio, now Treve. Plin. 3, 12.

TREBATIUS TESTA, C., a man banished by Julius Cæsar for following the interest of Pompey, and recalled by the eloquence of Cicero. He was afterwards reconciled to Cæsar, and enjoyed the favours and patronage of his successor Augustus. Trebatius was not less distinguished for his learning than for his integrity, his military experience, and knowledge of law. He wrote nine books on religious ceremonies, and treatises on civil law, and the verses that he composed proved him a poet of no inferior consequence. Horat. Sat. 2, 1, 4.

TREBELLIANUS, C. ANNIUS a pirate who proclaimed himself emperor of Rome, A.D. 264. He was defeated and slain in Isauria, by the lieutenants of Gallienus.

TREBELLIUS POLLIO, a Latin historian, who wrote an account of the lives of the emperors. The beginning of that history is lost; part of the reign of Valerian and the life of the two Gallieni, with the thirty tyrants, are the only fragments remaining. He flourished A.D. 305.

TREBIA, a river of Gallia Cisalpina, rising in the Apennines, and falling into the Po, a little to the west of Placentia. It is celebrated for the victory which Annibal obtained there over the forces of L. Sempronius, the Roman consul. Sil. 4, 4 6. — Lucan. 2, 46. — Liv. 21, 54 et 56.

TREBONIA LEX, de provinciis, by L. Trebonius, the tribune, A.U.C. 698. It assigned provinces to the consuls for five years: Spain to Pompey, Syria and the Parthian war to Crassus; and prolonged for a time the command in Gaul, which had been bestowed on Cæsar by the Vatinian law. Cato for opposing this law, was led to prison. According to Dio, he was only dragged from the assembly — Another, by L. Trebonius, the tribune, A.U.C. 306, which confirmed the election of the tribunes in the hands of the Roman people. Liv. 3, 5.

TREBONIUS, Caius, one of Cæsar's friends, made through his interest prætor and consul. Though thus raised to honours of office by Cæsar he yet preferred the safety of the republic to gratitude, and he joined in the conspiracy against his benefactor. On the fatal day, whilst the bloody deed was done, he detained Antony at the door in conversation, and thus preserved his life. After the dictator's death, Trebonius obtained Asia as his province, where he was treacherously killed by Dolabella at Smyrna. Cæs. Bell. 5, 17. — Cic. in Phil. 11, 2. — Horat. Sat. 1, 4, 114. — Garrisianus a governor of Africa, who put to death the proconsul Clodius Macer, by Galba's orders. Tacit. H. 1, 7. — A tribune who proposed a law at Rome, and imprisoned Cato, because he opposed it. Vid. Trebonia Lex.

TRES TABERNÆ, a small place or village on the Appian Way to Rome, where travellers stopped for refreshment. According to the Itinerary of Antoninus it was thirty-three Roman miles from Rome. Some critics and commentators, however, suppose that they were retail shops for the sale of provisions to travellers. Cic. Att. 2, 12. — Acts, 28, 15.

TREVERI, a nation of Gallia Belgica, between the Mosella, or Moselle, and Silva Arduenna. Their chief city was Augusta, called afterwards Treveri, now Treves. Cæs. B. G 5, 3. 6, 2. — Tac. Ann. 1, 41. 3, 42. Germ. 28. — Mela, 3, 2.

TRIARIUS, C., an orator commended by Cicero — A friend of Pompey. He had for some time the care of the war in Asia against Mithridates, whom he defeated, and by whom he was afterwards beaten. He was killed in the civil wars of Pompey and Cæsar. Cæs. B. C. 3, 5.

TRIBALLI a Thracian people, by far the most numerous and powerful tribe in that country. They were conquered by Philip, the father of Alexander; and some ages after, they maintained a long war against the Roman emperors. Thucyd. 2, 96. — Strab. 7

TRIBOCI, a German tribe, on the left bank of the Rhine, and between that river and the Mediomatrice and Leuci. Their chief city was Argentoratum, now Strasbourg, near which Julian defeated the Alemanni. Tacit. in Germ. 24. Cæs. B. G. 1, 51

TRIBUNI PLEBIS, magistrates at Rome, created in the year U. C. 261, when the people after a quarrel with the senators had retired to Mons Sacer. Two tribunes were at first created, at the assembly by Curiæ, who created three colleagues to themselves. In the year 283, they were first elected at the Comitia Tributa, and, in A. U. C. 297, ten tribunes were created, two out of each class, which number continued ever after. The appellation of tribune was given to them because they were at first chosen from the tribunes of the soldiers. Their office was annual, and as the first had been created on the 4th of the ides of December, that day was ever after chosen for the election. Their power, though at first small, and granted by the patricians to appease the momentary seditions of the populace, soon became formidable, and the senators repented too late of having consented to elect magistrates, who not only preserved the rights of the people, but could summon assemblies, propose laws, stop the consultations of the senate, and even abolish their decrees by the word Veto. Their approbation was also necessary to confirm the senatusconsulta, and this was done by affixing the letter T under it. If any irregularity happened in the state, their power was almost absolute; they criticised the conduct of all the public magistrates, and even dragged a consul to prison, if the measures he pursued were hostile to the peace of Rome. The dictator alone was their superior, but when that magistrate was elected, the office of tribune was not, like that of all other inferior magistrates, abolished while he continued at the head of the state. It was one of the peculiar privileges connected with the office of tribune that their persons should be held sacred, (sacrosancti); and any one, therefore, who hurt a tribune in word or deed, was held accursed, and his goods were confiscated to the temple of Ceres. Under the sanction of this law, they carried their power to an extravagant height. By the Julian law also it was forbidden under the severest penalties, to interrupt a tribune while speaking, and no one was allowed to speak in the assemblies summoned by them without their permission. The marks by which they were distinguished from other magistrates were not very conspicuous. They wore no particular dress, only a beadle called viator marched before them. At first they were not allowed seats in the senate, but sat on benches without, and the decrees of that body were brought to them for their approval or rejection; they were soon, however, admitted within. Yet great as their power might appear, they received a heavy wound from their number and as their consultations and resolutions were of no effect if they were not all unanimous, the senate often took advantage of their avarice, and by gaining one of them by bribes, they, as it were suspended the authority of the rest. The office of tribune of the people, though at first deemed mean and servile, was afterward's one of the first steps that led to more honourable employments; and as no patrician was permitted to canvass for the tribuneship, we find many that descended among the plebeians to exercise that important office. From the power with which they were at last invested by the agrarian, the intrigues, and continual applications of those who were in office, they became almost absolute in the state; and it has been properly observed, that they caused far greater troubles than those which they were at first created to silence. Sylla, when raised to the dictatorship, gave a fatal blow to the authority of the tribunes and by one of his decrees they were no longer permitted to harangue and inflame the people. They could make no laws, no appeal lay to their tribunal; and such as had been tribunes were not permitted to solicit for the other offices of the state. This disgrace, however, was but momentary, at the death of the tyrant the tribunes recovered their privileges by means of Cotta and Pompey the Great. In the consulship of the former, they obtained the right of enjoying other offices, and in the consulship of Pompey and Crassus, all their former powers, a thing which Cæsar strenuously prevented. The tribunes henceforth were employed by the leading men as the tools of their ambition. Backed by a hired mob, they determined every thing by force; they made and abrogated laws at pleasure, and in fine threw the whole state into utter confusion. Julius Cæsar who had been the principal cause of their excesses, and had made the violation of their power a pretext for taking up arms, having at last become absolute, reduced the tribunitian power to a mere name, and deprived the tribunes of their office at pleasure. Augustus got the tribunitian power conferred upon himself by a decree of the senate. This power gave him the right of holding the senate, of assembling the people, and of being appealed to in all cases. It also rendered his person sacred and inviolable, so that it became a capital crime to injure him in word or deed, which, under the succeeding emperors, served as a pretext for cutting off numbers of the chief men of the state. Hence this among other powers used to be conferred on the emperors in the beginning of their reign, or upon other solemn occasions; and hence also the years of their government were called the years of their tribunitian power, which are often found marked on ancient coins, computed not generally from the commencement of their reign. Under Constantine the tribuneship was totally abolished. The tribunes were never permitted to sleep out of the city, except at the Feriæ Latinæ, when they went with other magistrates to offer sacrifices upon a mountain near Alba. Their houses were always open, and they received every complaint, and were ever ready to redress the wrongs of their constituents. Their authority was not extended beyond the walls of the city. — There were also other officers who bore the name of tribunes, such as the tribunus militum or militares, who commanded a division of the legions ten centuries or about 1000 men. They commanded each in turn, usually a month about. They were empowered to decide all quarrels that might arise in the army; they took care of the camp, and gave the watch-word. There were only three at first, chosen by Romulus, but the number was at last increased to six in every legion. After the expulsion of the Tarquins, they were chosen by the consuls, but afterwards the right of electing them was divided between the people and the consul. The people, after A. U. C. 393, usually appointed six annually out of twenty-four. Afterwards the manner of choosing them varied. By the Atilian law the people claimed to themselves the right of choosing sixteen for four legions, or sixteen out of twenty-four, that is, two-thirds of the whole. Those chosen by the people were called Comitiati, by the consuls, Rufuli or Ruruli. Sometimes the people elected the whole. In dangerous conjunctures, however, the choice was for the most part left entirely to the consuls. Under the emperors they were chosen chiefly from among the senators and equites. The former were called latielavii, and the latter angusticlavii, from their peculiar dress. They were a golden ring, and were in office no longer than six months.——There were also some officers called tribuni militum e plebeiis potestate, elected instead of consuls, A. U. C. 310. They were only three originally, but the number was afterwards increased to six or more, according to the will and pleasure of the people and the emergencies of the state. Part of them were plebeians, and the rest of patrician families. When they had subsisted for about seventy years, not without some interruption, the office was totally abolished, as the plebeians were admitted to share the consulship, and the consuls continued at the head of the state till the end of the commonwealth.——The tribuni cohortium prætorianarum were entrusted with the person of the emperor, which they guarded and protected.——The tribuni ærarii were officers chosen from among the people, who kept the money which was to be applied to defray the expenses of the army. The richest persons were always chosen as much money was requisite for the pay of the soldiers. They were greatly distinguished in the state, and they shared with the senators and Roman knights the privileges of judging. They were abolished by Julius Cæsar, but Augustus re-established them, and created 200 more, to decide causes of smaller importance.——The tribuni celerum had the command of the guard which Romulus chose for the safety of his person. They were 100 in number distinguished for their probity their opulence, and their nobility.——The tribuni voluptatum were commissioned to take care of the amusements which were prepared for the people, and that nothing might be wanting in the exhibitions. This office was also honourable.

TRICALA, or TRICOLA, a mountain fortress and town in Sicily, near the lower coast, east of Selinus, and north of the mouth of the Crimisus. Sil Ital. 14. 271.

TRICASSES, a people of Gaul, north east of the Senonenes, and through whose territories flows the Sequana, or Seine, in the earlier part of its course. Their chief city was Augusta Bona, afterwards Tricasses, now Troyes. Amm. Marc. 15, 11. 16, 2.

TRICCA, now Tricala, a city of Thessaly, south east of Gomphi, and near the junction of the Peneus and Lethæus. It is placed by Homer under the dominion of the sons of Æsculapius. It possessed a temple of Æsculapius which was held in great veneration. Homer. Il. 2. 729.—Strab. 9.

TRICLARIA, a yearly festival celebrated by the inhabitants of three cities in Ionia, to appease the anger of Diana Triclaria, whose temple had been defiled by the adulterous connexion of Menalippus and Comætho. It was usual to sacrifice a boy and a girl, but this barbarous custom was abolished by Eurypilus. The three cities were Aroe, Mesatis, and Anthea, whose united labours had erected the temple of the goddess. Paus. 7, 19.

TRICORII, a Gallic tribe in Gallia Narbonensis, in the territory of Massilia and Aquæ Sextiæ. Liv. 21, 31. Plin. 3, 4.

TRIDENTUM, now Trent, a city of Rhætia, on the river Athesis, or Adige, and a short distance from the northern confines of Venetia. It was built by the Cenomani who were dispossessed by the Romans. It is celebrated in ecclesiastical history as the seat of the eighteenth and last general council, which assembled in 1545, and was prolonged by intrigues and various changes for eighteen years. The decisions of this council are implicitly received as the standard of faith, morals, and discipline in the Romish church. Justin. 20, 5.

TRIETERICA, a name given to the orgies of Bacchus, as celebrated every three years. Virg. Æn. 4, 302.

TRIGEMINA, one of the Roman gates, so called because the three Horatii went through it against the Curiatii. Liv. 4, 16. 35, 41. 40, 51.

TRINACRIA, one of the ancient names of Sicily, from its triangular form. Virg. Æn. 3. 384 &c.

TRINOBANTES, a people of Britain in modern Essex and Middlesex. Tacit. Ann. 14, 31.—Cæs. B. G. 5, 20.

TRIOCALA, Vid. Tricala.

TRIOPAS or TRIOPS, a son of Neptune by Canace, the daughter of Æolus. He was father of Iphimedia and of Erisichthon who is called on that account Triopeius, and his daughter Triopeis. Ovid. Met. 8, 7 4.—Apollod. 1, 7.——A son of Phorbas, father to Agenor, Jasus, and Messene. Homer Homn in Ap 211.

TRIOPIUM, a city of Caria, founded by Triopas, son of Erisichthon, and situate near the promontory of Triopium, at the extremity of Doris. On the promontory was a temple of Apollo, where the Dorians celebrated games in honour of this god. At this temple was held a general assembly of the Dorians in Asia, upon the model of that of Thermopylæ. Vid. Doris.

TRIPHYLIA, the southern portion of Elis, so said to have derived its name from Triphylus an Arcadian prince, or from its inhabitants having sprung from three different tribes, viz. the Epei the Minyæ, and the Elei. It was a fertile and well inhabited country. Polyb. 4, 77 et 78. —Strab. 8.

TRIPOLIS, now Tripoli, a city of Syria, on the sea-coast below Aradus. Tripolis was so called in consequence of its having been built by the people of the three cities Tyrus, Sidon, and Aradus, for the convenience of assembling in the place the several federal bodies of Phœnice, for the discussion of such matters as related to the whole country. Diod Sic. 16, 41. Strab. 16.

—A region of Africa, on the coast of the Mediterranean, between the two Syrtes. It appears to have acquired its name on account of its containing the three cities of Leptis Magna, now Lebida, Sabrata, now Sabart, and Œa, the site of which the modern city of Tripoli is supposed to occupy.—A city of Pontus, on the coast, at the mouth of the river Tripolis, and north-east of Cerasus It is now called Tireboli. Plin. 6, 4.—A city of Lydia, on the western bank of the Mæander, north west of Hierapolis, and near the confluence of the Mæander and Cludrus. Plin 5, 29.

TRIPTOLEMUS, a son of Oceanus and Terra, or, according to some, of Trochilus, a priest of Argos According to the more received opinion, he was son of Celeus king of Attica, by Neæra, whom some have called Metanira, Cothonea Hyona, Melania, or Polymnia. He was born at Eleusis in Attica, and was cured in his youth of a severe illness by the care of Ceres, who had been invited into the house of Celeus by the monarch s children, as she travelled over the country in quest of her daughter To repay the kindness of Celeus, the goddess took particular notice of his son. She fed him with her own milk, and placed him on burning coals during the night, to destroy whatever particles of mortality he had received from his parents. The mother was astonished at the uncommon growth of her son, and she had the curiosity to watch Ceres She disturbed the goddess by a sudden cry, when Triptolemus was laid on the burning ashes and as Ceres was therefore unable to make him immortal, she taught him agriculture, and rendered him serviceable to mankind, by instructing him how to sow corn, and make bread. She also gave him her chariot, which was drawn by two dragons, and in this celestial vehicle he travelled all over the earth, and distributed corn to all the inhabitants of the world. In Scythia, the favourite of Ceres nearly lost his life, but Lyncus, the king of the country, who had conspired to murder him, was changed into a lynx. At his return to Eleusis, Triptolemus restored Ceres her chariot, and established the Eleusinian festivals and mysteries in honour of the deity. He reigned for some time, and after death received divine honours. Some suppose that he accompanied Bacchus in his Indian expedition. Dionys. Hygin. fab 147 — Paus. 2, 14. 3, 4. — Justin 2, 6.—Apollod 1, 5.—Callim in Cer. 22.—Ovid. Met 5, 646. Fast 4, 501. Trist. 3, 8, 1.

TRIQUETRA a name given to Sicily by the Latins, for its triangular form

TRISMEGISTUS, a celebrated Egyptian priest and philosopher. Vid. Mercurius.

TRITÆA, a city of Achaia, south-west of Ægium, and near the confines of Elis. It was said to have been founded by Calludes who came from Cumæ in Italy, or, according to other accounts, by Menalippus, son of Mars and Triteæ. It was made dependent on Patræ, by order of Augustus. Its remains are generally supposed to correspond with those observed by modern travellers at Goumenitsa. Paus 7, 22 —Strab 8

TRITOGENIA, a surname of Pallas, because she was born on the 3d of the month, or because she was born on the borders of the lake Tritonis, &c Diod. 1.

TRITON, a sea deity, son of Neptune, by Amphitrite; or, according to some, by Celeno, or Salacia. He was very powerful among the sea deities, and could calm the ocean and abate storms at pleasure. He is generally represented as blowing a shell, his body above the waist is like that of a man, and below a dolphin. Some represent him with the fore feet of a horse. Many of the sea deities are called Tritons, but the name is generally applied to those only who are half men and half fishes. Apollod. 1, 4 — Hesiod. Theog 930 - Ovid. Met. 1, 333. Orde Nat D 1, 28 Virg Æn. 1, 148. 6, 173. — Paus 9, 20 —A river of Africa, rising in a part of mount Atlas called Usaletus, and, after passing through the two lakes of Libya and Tritonis, entering the sea at Sacape It is now the Cabes

TRITONIS, now Foramani a lake of Africa, inland from the Syrtis Minor. It was also named Pallas, from the tradition that Minerva, hence surnamed Tritogenia and Tritonia, first made her appearance on its shores; the remembrance of this legend was observed by an annual feast, during which the most beautiful woman in the country was clothed like Pallas, and drawn in triumph round the lake. Near the Tritonis Palus was the Libya Palus, now Lowdeah Herod. 4, 178 — Paus 9, 33 — Virg. Æn. 2, 171 Mela, 1, 7 —Athena is also called Tritonia, because dedicated to Minerva.

TRIVIA, a surname given to Diana, because she presided over all places where three roads met. At the new moon the Athenians offered her sacrifices, and a sumptuous entertainment which was generally distributed among the poor. Virg. Æn. 6, 13 7, 774.—Ovid. Met. 2, 416. Fast 1, 389

TRIVIÆ ANTRUM a place in the valley of Aricia, where the nymph Egeria resided. Martial 6, 47.

TRIVICUM a place situate among the mountains that separate Samnium from Apulia. The little town of Trevico, which appears on a height above the course of the ancient Appian Way, indicates the site of this place. Horat. Sat 1, 5, 79.

TRIUMVIRI, reipublicæ constituendæ, were three magistrates appointed equally to govern the Roman state with absolute power. These officers gave a fatal blow to the expiring independence of the Roman people, and became celebrated for their different pursuits, their ambition, and their various fortunes. The first triumvirate, B C 60, was in the hands of J. Cæsar, Pompey and Crassus, who, at the expiration of their office, kindled a civil war. The second and last triumvirate, B. C. 43, was under Augustus, M. Antony, and Lepidus, and through them the Romans totally lost their liberty. Augustus disagreed with his colleagues, and after he had defeated them, he made himself absolute in Rome. The triumvirate was in full force at Rome for the space of about 12 years. —There were also officers who were called triumviri capitales, created A. U C. 464. They took cognisance of murders and robberies, and every thing in which slaves were concerned. Criminals under sentence of death were entrusted to their care, and they had them executed according to the commands of the prætors.—The triumviri nocturni watched over the safety of Rome in the night time, and in case of fire were ever ready to give orders, and to take the most effectual measures to extinguish it.—The triumviri agrarii had the care of colonies that were sent to settle in different parts of the empire. They made a fair division of the lands among the citizens, and exercised over the new colony all the power which was placed in the hands of the consuls at Rome.—The triumviri monetales were masters of the mint, and had the care of the coin, hence their office was generally intimated by the following letters often seen on ancient coins and medals, III VIR A.A.A.F.F. i. e. Triumviri auro, argento, aere flando, feriendo Some suppose that they were created only in the age of Cicero, as those who were employed before them were called Decemviri flandorum curatores.—The triumviri valetudinis were chosen when Rome was visited by a plague or some pestilential distemper, and they took particular care of the temples of health and virtue.—The triumviri sexatus legendi were appointed to name those that were most worthy to be made senators from among the plebeians. They were first chosen in the age of Augustus, as before, this privilege belonged to the kings, and afterwards devolved upon the consuls, and the censors. A. U. C. 310.—The triumviri mensarii were chosen in the second Punic war to take care of the coin and prices of exchange.

TRIUMVIRORUM INSULA, an island in the small river Rhenus, one of the tributaries of the Po, celebrated for the meeting of the second triumvirate, Augustus, Antony, and Lepidus who remained there three days, and agreed to share the sovereign authority among them. Paul. Oro. et Ast.—Dio Cass. 46 Suet Aug. 96

TROADES, the inhabitants of Troas

TROAS a district on the Ægean coast of Mysia in Asia Minor, extending as far south as the promontory of Lectum, now Cape Baba, of which Troy was the capital. The kingdom of Priam, if we form our ideas of it from the poems of Homer, must have been of very limited extent. Strabo, indeed, through partiality for his favourite poet, seeks to enlarge the limits of Priam's kingdom, and makes it to have comprehended the country on the coast of the Propontis as far as the river Æsepus, near Cyzicus. Homer, however, names many expressly as allies of the Trojans whom Strabo would wish to consider as the subjects of Priam The northern part of Troas was termed Dardania, from Dardanus, one of the ancestors of Priam. The Trojans were very probably of Thracian origin Vid. Troja.

TROCHOIS, a lake in the island of Delos, near which Apollo and Diana were born.

TROGMI, a people of Galatia, who occupied the north eastern portion of that country towards Pontus and Cappadocia, and chiefly on the right bank of the river Halys. Their chief city was Tavium. Liv. 38, 16.—Plin 5, 32.

TROEZENE, a city of Argolis, situate on the Sinus Saronicus, near the south-eastern extremity of that country, and north-east of Hermione. It was a very ancient city, and is said to have borne the several names of Orea, Althepia, and Posidonia, before it received that of Troezene, from Troezen, the son of Pelops, one of the earliest sovereigns of the country. He was succeeded by Pittheus, whose daughter marrying Ægeus became the mother of Theseus. This hero was born at Troezene, where he long resided Many of his adventures, as well as those of Phædra and Hippolitus, are represented by the tragic poets as occurring at this place Troezene was at one time a republic independent of Argos, to which it had been subject at the time of the Trojan expedition. Its ruins are to be seen near the village of Damala, in a plain situate at the foot of a lofty range of mountains, which runs from the Saronic gulf to that of Hermione Paus 2, 30. Herod 7, 99, 8, 43 9, 28.

TROGILIÆ, three small islands near Samos, named Pælon, Argennon, and Sandalion. Plin. 5, 31.

TROGILIUM, a promontory at the foot of mount Mycale, opposite to, and about five miles from, Samos. It is mentioned by St Luke in the Acts, in his account of St Paul's voyage from Troas to Miletus, by Mitylene, Chios, and Samos. It is now called Cape S Maria. Strab. 14.—Acts, 20, 15.

TROGLODYTÆ, an appellation denoting a people who dwelt in caves (τρωγλη spertu, hiatus cubo) The whole western coast of the Sinus Arabicus was inhabited by Troglodytæ; but the name of Troglodytice, or Thebaïce, by which it was also known, was frequently confined to the coast of Ethiopia alone. They lived entirely upon fish, whence they were also called Ichthyophagi, they are represented as not possessing the least degree of civilisation, but as the lowest grade of mankind, and almost on a par with the brute creation. Strab 16.—Plin. 2, 70. 6, 29 et 29

TROGUS POMPEIUS, a Latin historian, B. C. 31, born in Gaul. His father was one of the friends and adherents of J Cæsar, and his ancestors had obtained privileges and honours from the most illustrious of the Romans. Trogus wrote a universal history of all the most important events that had happened from the beginning of the world to the age of Augustus, divided into 44 books. This history, which was greatly admired for its purity and elegance, was epitomized by Justin, and is still extant. Some suppose that the epitome is the cause that the original of Trogus is lost. Justin. 47, 3.—Aug. de Civ. D. 4, 6.

TROJA, a city, the capital of Troas, or, according to others, a country of which Ilium was the capital. It was built on a small eminence, a short distance above the confluence of the Simois and Scamander, between these two rivers, and about three miles from the sea shore. Dardanus, the first king of the country, built it, and called it Dardania, and from Tros, one of his successors, it was called Troja, and from Ilus, Ilion. Neptune is also said to have built, or more properly repaired, its walls, in the age of king Laomedon This city has been celebrated by the poems of Homer and Virgil, and of all the wars which have been carried on among the ancients, that of Troy is the most famous. The Trojan war was undertaken by the Greeks, to recover Helen, whom Paris, the son of Priam, king of Troy, had carried away from the house of Menelaus. All Greece united to avenge the cause of Menelaus, and every prince furnished a certain number of ships and soldiers. According to Euripides, Virgil, and Lycophron, the armament of the Greeks amounted to 1000 ships. Homer mentions them as being 1186, and Thucydides supposes that they were 1200 in number. The number of men which these ships carried is unknown: yet as the largest contained about 120 men each, and the smallest 50, it may be supposed that no less than 100,000 men were engaged in this celebrated expedition. Agamemnon was chosen general of all these forces; but the princes and kings of Greece were admitted among his counsellors, and by them all the operations of the war were directed. The most celebrated of the Grecian princes that distinguished themselves in this war, were Achilles, Ajax, Menelaus, Ulysses, Diomedes Protesilaus, Patroclus, Agamemnon, Nestor, Neoptolemus, &c. The Grecian army was opposed by a more numerous force. The king of Troy received assistance from the neighbouring princes in Asia Minor, and reckoned among his most active generals, Rhesus, king of Thrace, and Memnon, who entered the field with 20,000 Assyrians and Ethiopians. Many of the adjacent cities were reduced and plundered before the Greeks approached the walls, but when the siege was begun, the enemies on both sides gave proofs of valour and intrepidity. The army of the Greeks, however, was visited by a plague, and the operations were not less retarded by the quarrel of Agamemnon and Achilles. The loss was great on both sides; the most valiant of the Trojans, and particularly of the sons of Priam, were slain in the field; and, indeed, so great was the slaughter, that the rivers of the country are represented as filled with dead bodies and suits of armour. After the siege had been carried on for ten years, some of the Trojans, among whom were Æneas and Antenor, betrayed the city into the hands of the enemy, and Troy was reduced to ashes. The poets however, support, that the Greeks made themselves masters of the place by artifice. They secretly filled a large wooden horse with armed men, and led away their army from the plains, as if to return home. The Trojans brought the wooden horse into their city, and in the night, the Greeks that were confined within the sides of the animal, rushed out and opened the gates to their companions, who had returned from the place of their concealment. The greatest part of the inhabitants were put to the sword, and the others carried away by the conquerors. This happened, according to the Arundelian marbles, about 1184 years before the Christian era, in the 3530th year of the Julian period, on the night between the 11th and 12th of June, 404 years before the first Olympiad. Troy appears, however, to have partly risen from its ruins, for Xerxes and Alexander both visited it, but it never gained its former importance being eclipsed by Ilium Novum, which was built about 30 stadia lower down the Simois than the old city. It is said that J. Cæsar, who wished to pass for one of the descendants of Æneas, and consequently to be related to the Trojans, intended to make it the capital of the Roman empire, and to transport there the senate and the Roman people. The same apprehensions were entertained in the reign of Augustus and according to some, an ode of Horace, Justum et tenacem propositi virum, was written purposely to dissuade the emperor from putting into execution so wild a project. The site of Troy is supposed to be now occupied by the village of Bounarbachi, but the lapse of more than 3000 years has not only obliterated every trace of the city, but has also effected such changes in the face of the country, as to render it impossible to ascertain its exact position, farther than that against which the ancient descriptions offer no objections. [Vid. Paris, Æneas, Antenor, Agamemnon, Laomedon, Menelaus, &c.] Virg. Æn.—Homer.—Ovid.—Diod. 4c.

TROJANI, and TROJUGENÆ the inhabitants of Troy.

TROJANI LUDI, games instituted by Æneas, or his son Ascanius, to commemorate the death of Anchises, and celebrated in the circus at Rome. Boys of the best families, dressed in a neat manner, and accoutred with suitable arms and weapons were permitted to enter the list. Sylla exhibited them in his dictatorship, and under Augustus they were observed with unusual pomp and solemnity. A mock fight on horseback, or sometimes on foot, was exhibited. The leader of the party was called princeps centutis, and was generally the son of a senator, or the heir apparent to the empire. Virg. Æn. 5. 602.—Suet. in Cæs. et in Aug. - Plut. in Syll.

TROILUS, a son of Priam and Hecuba, during whose life the fates had decreed that Troy should not fall. This important oracle did not deter him from attacking Achilles, by which he lost his life, and his country her independence. Some have said that Achilles was immoderately fond of this Trojan prince, and that he actually killed him by the excess of his embraces. Apollod. 3, 12. - Horat. Od 2, 9, 16.—Virg. Æn. 1, 474.

TROPHONIUS, a celebrated architect, son of Erginus, king of Orchomenos, in Bœotia. He built Apollo's temple at Delphi, with the assistance of his brother Agamedes, and when he demanded of the god a reward for his trouble, he was told by the priestess to wait eight days, and to live during that time with all cheerfulness and pleasure. When the days were passed, Trophonius and his brother were found dead in their bed. According to Pausanias, however, he was swallowed up alive in the earth, and when afterwards the country was visited by a great drought, the Bœotians were directed to apply to Trophonius for relief, and to seek him at Lebadea, where he gave oracles in a cave. They discovered this cave by means of a swarm of bees, and Trophonius told them how to ease their misfortunes. From that time Trophonius was honoured as a god; he passed for the son of Apollo; a chapel and a statue were erected to him, and sacrifices were offered to his divinity, when consulted to give oracles. The cave of Trophonius became one of the most celebrated oracles of Greece. Many ceremonies were required, and the suppliant was obliged to make particular sacrifices, to anoint his body with oil, and to bathe in the waters of certain rivers. He was to be clothed in a linen robe, and with a cake of honey in his hand, he was directed to descend into the cave by a narrow entrance, from whence he returned backwards, after he had received an answer. He was always pale and dejected at his return, and thence it became proverbial to say of a melancholy man, that he had consulted the oracle of Trophonius. There were annually exhibited games in honour of Trophonius at Lebadea. Paus 9, 37 &c.—Cic. Tusc. 1, 47.—Plut.—Plin. 34 7.—Ælian. V. H. 3 45.

TROS, a son of Erichthonius, king of Troy, who married Callirhoe, the daughter of the Scamander, by whom he had Ilus, Assaracus, and Ganymedes. He made war against Tantalus king of Phrygia, whom he accused of having stolen away the youngest of his sons. The capital of Phrygia was called Troja from him, and the country itself Troas. Virg G 3, 36.—Hom. Il 20, 219.—Apollod. 3, 12.

TROSULUM, now Trosio, a town of Etruria, to the west of Ferentinum. Pliny tells us, that this town having been taken by cavalry alone, the Roman horse from that circumstance obtained the name of Trossuli. Plin. 33, 2.

TRYPHIODORUS, a native of Egypt, of whose history nothing is known, lived in the 6th century, and was the author of a poem, entitled Ἴλιου ἅλωσις, the Destruction of Troy. It is marked by bombast and affectation of ornament. He is said to have written other poems as the Maryathonaca, the Hippodamea, and the Odyssey called Lipogrammatic, λιπογραμματικὴ, because some particular letter of the alphabet was excluded from each of the 24 books, or according to others, because the letter Σ was excluded from the whole poem. The Destruction of Troy consists of only 691 verses, and is perhaps more a sort of argument of a more full work contemplated by the author. It was first printed by Aldus, and has passed through subsequent editions by Northmore, 8vo, Cantab 1791, and Wernicke, 8vo, Lips. 1819, which are those the most esteemed.

TRYPHO, a tyrant of Apamea in Syria, put to death by Antiochus Justin 36, 1.—A surname of one of the Ptolemies. Ælian. V. H. 14, 31.—A grammarian of Alexandria, in the age of Augustus, who wrote, among other works, a treatise entitled πάθη λέξεων, and another περὶ τροπων. The best edition of these two is given in the Museum Criticum, vol 1, p. 32, &c.

TUBERO, Q. ÆLIUS, a Roman consul, son-in-law of Paulus the conqueror of Perseus. He is celebrated for his poverty, in which he seemed to glory, as well as the rest of his family. Sixteen of the Tuberos, with their wives and children, lived in a small house, and maintained themselves with the produce of a little field, which they cultivated with their own hands. The first piece of silver plate that entered the house of Tubero was a small cup, which his father in-law presented to him after he had conquered the king of Macedonia.

TUBURBO, two towns of Africa, called Major and Minor. Plin 5, 4.

TUCCA, PLAUTIUS, a friend of Horace and Virgil. He was ordered by Augustus, as some report, to revise the Æneid of Virgil, which remained uncorrected on account of the premature death of the poet. Horat. Sat. 1, 5, 40 10, 84.

TUDER, a town of Umbria, north-west of Spoletium, and near the Tiber. It was famous for its worship of Mars. It was taken by Crassus during the civil wars. It is now Todi. Sil. Ital 4 222 et 464.—Plut Crass et C Mar

TUISTO, a deity of the Germans, son of Terra, and the founder of the nation. Tacit. de Germ 2.

TULINGI, a people of Gaul, reckoned among the Helvetii by some, but more correctly their neighbours, and of Germanic origin. Cæs B. G 1, 5

TULLIA a daughter of Servius Tullius, king of Rome. She married Tarquin the Proud, after she had murdered her first husband Arunx and consented to see Tullius assassinated, that Tarquin might be raised to the throne. It is said that she ordered her chariot to be driven over the body of her aged father, which had been thrown all mangled and bloody into one of the streets of Rome. She was afterwards banished from Rome, with her husband. Ovid. in Ib. 361.—Another daughter of Servius Tullius, who married Tarquin the Proud. She was murdered by her own husband, that he might marry her ambitious sister of the same name.—A daughter of Cicero. Vid Tulliola.

TULLIA LEX, de senatu by M. Tullius Cicero, A.U.C. 690, enacted that those who had a libera legatio granted them by the senate, should be incapacitated from being candidates for any office, to exhibit a show of gladiators, unless that case had devolved upon him by will. Senators guilty of the crime of ambitus were punished with the aquæ et ignis interdictio for ten years, and the penalty inflicted on the commons was more severe than that of the Calpurnian law.

TULLIANUM, a name given to part of the public prison at Rome. The prison was built by Ancus Martius, as we learn from Livy, who tells us that that king, "to repress the growing licentiousness, caused a prison to be constructed in the middle of the city, overlooking the Forum." The subterranean part was added by Servius Tullius, and was thence called Tullianum. It was also denominated Robur, and if this is what Livy means by the Carcer Lautumiarum, or the prison of the stone-quarries, we may perhaps safely conclude that the excavation was originally made for the purpose of procuring stone, and that the quarry was afterwards converted into a prison. The steps, known by the name of the Scalæ Gemoniæ, by which criminals were dragged to prison, or led out to execution, were near the entrance. The prison itself consists of two cells, one above the other, to which the only entrance was by a small aperture in the roof of the upper cell; while a similar aperture in its floor led to the cell below. The upper cell is seven and-twenty feet in length, by twenty in width; the lower, which is of an oval form, is twenty by ten. The height of the former is fourteen feet, that of the latter only seven. These dungeons served as the state prisons, being appropriated to persons of distinction. It was here that the Catiline conspirators were confined and executed; it was here that Jugurtha perished of hunger, here, too, it was that Sejanus, that sport of fortune, met the punishment due to his crimes, and that Perseus, the last of the Macedonian kings, dragged on a miserable existence, till, towards the close of life, he was removed, at the intercession of his conqueror, Paulus Æmilius, to a less frightful abode. Liv. 1, 33 &c., 26.—Sallust. de Bell. Cat. 55.

TULLIOLA, or TULLIA, a daughter of Cicero by Terentia. She married Caius Piso, and afterwards Furius Crassipes and lastly P. Cornelius Dolabella. With this last husband she had every reason to be dissatisfied. Dolabella was turbulent and consequently the cause of much grief to Tullia and her father. Tullia died in child-bed, about 44 years before Christ. Cicero was inconsolable on this occasion. According to a ridiculous story which some of the moderns report, in the age of pope Paul third, a monument was discovered on the Appian road, with the superscription of Tullioles filiæ meæ. The bigly of a woman was found in it, which was reduced to ashes as soon as touched; there was also a lamp burning, which was extinguished as soon as the air gained admission there, and which was supposed to have been lighted above 1,000 years Cic - Plut in Cic.

TULLUS, HOSTILIUS, the third king of Rome after the death of Numa He was of a warlike and active disposition, and signalised himself by his expedition against the people of Alba, whom he conquered, and whose city he destroyed, after the famous battle of the Horatii and Curiatii He afterwards carried his arms against the Latins and the neighbouring states with success, and enforced reverence for majesty among his subjects. He died with all his family, about 640 years before the Christian era, after a reign of thirty two years The manner of his death is not precisely known. Some suppose that he was killed by lightning while he was performing some magical ceremonies in his own house, or, according to the more probable accounts of others, he was murdered by Ancus Martius, who set fire to the palace, to make it believed that the impiety of Tullus had been punished by heaven. Flor. 1, 3 — *Dionys. TURNUS, a king of the Rutuli, son of Daunus and Venilia. He made war against Æneas, and attempted to drive him away from Italy, that he might not marry the daughter of Latinus, who had been previously engaged to him. His efforts were attended with no success, though supported with great courage, and a numerous army. He was conquered, and at last killed in a single combat by Æneas. He is represented as a man of uncommon strength. Virg Æn. 7, 56, &c.—Tibull 2, 5, 19. Ovid Fast 4, 875. Met 14, 451

TUSCULUM, a town of Latium, on the summit of the ridge of hills which forms the continuation of the Alban mount, and above the modern town of Frascati It was distant about one hundred stadia from Rome, or twelve miles and a half. It is said to have been built by Telegonus, son of Ulysses and Circe. Like all the neighbouring states, great enmity subsisted between the inhabitants of it and the Romans Tarquin the Proud, in order to maintain his authority at Rome, and secure the friendship of the citizens of Tusculum, gave his daughter in marriage to a leading man among them I says, that when Porsenna made peace with the Romans Tarquin repaired to his son-in-law Tusculum, which occasioned a war between Tusculum and the Romans, which war various successes, terminated in favour Romans, at the lake Regillus Juvenal boast of having given birth to M Tull several of the Fabii &c Cicero has this town famous by his Tusculan letters he wrote at his Villa Tusculana in or several parts of the work he spe number and variety of country-house Romans had in that neighbourhood, on the brity of the air and of the temples, acan cascades and libraries that made the neighbourhood of Tusculum, and rend most enchanting and attractive, both mind and the body. Dion Hal. 10, 26. Ovid Fast 3 92 4, 71 Propert 2, 35.—*Sil. TYANA, now Ketch hus sr, a town of Cappadocia, strongly fortified by nature and art, lying on the main road to Cilicia and Syria, and at the oot of mount Taurus. It is supposed to be the ame with Dana, through which Cyrus passed n his way to Syria. Its original appellation is aid to have been Thoana, which it obtained fr m Tyana, king of the Tauri, who followed Pylades nd Orestes hither in order to wreak his vengeance on them. It gave name to the district Tyanitis and was also called Eusebia ad Taurum. It was the birth-place of the impostor Apollonius, whose life and actions are recorded y Philostratus. Plin. 6 3.—Amm Marc 24, 6.

TYDEUS, a son of Oeneus king of Calydon fled from his country after the accidental murder of one of his friends and found a safe asylum in the court of Adrastus, king of Argos, whose daughter Deiphyle he married When Adrastus wished to replace his son-in-law Polynices on the throne of Thebes, Tydeus undertook to announce the war to Eteocles, who usurped the crown. The reception he met with provoked his resentment; he challenged Eteocles and his officers to single combat, and defeated them. On his return to Argos he slew fifty of the Thebans who had conspired against his life and lay in an ambush to surprise him; and only one of the number was permitted to return to Thebes, to bear the tidings of the fate of his companions He was one of the seven chiefs of the army of Adrastus, and during the Theban war he behaved with great courage. Many of the enemies expired under his blows, till he was at last wounded by Menalippus Though the blow was fatal, Tydeus had the strength to dart at his enemy, and to bring him to the ground, before he was carried away from the fight by his companions At his own request the dead body of Menalippus was brought to him and after he had ordered the head to be cut off, he began to tear out the brains with his teeth The savage barbarity of Tydeus disgusted Minerva, who was coming to bring him relief and to make him immortal; and the goddess left him to his fate, and suffered him to die. He was buried at Argos, where his monument was still to be seen in the age of Pausanias. He was father to Diomedes. Some suppose that the cause of his flight to Argos, was the murder of the son of Melus, or, according to others, of Alcathous, his father's brother, or, perhaps his own brother Olenius. Homer Il 4, 365 et 397. Apollod. 1, 8, 3, 6.—*Aeschyl. TYNDARUS, a son of Gbalus and Gorgophone, or, according to some, of Perieres He was king of Lacedaemon, and married the celebrated Leda, who bore him Timandra, Philonoe, &c., and also became mother of Pollux and Helen by Jupiter. Vid. Leda, Castor, Pollux, Clytemnestra, &c.

TYPHOEUS, or TYPHON, a famous giant, son of Tartarus and Terra, who had a hundred heads like those of a serpent or a dragon Flames of devouring fire were darted from his mouth and from his eyes, and he uttered horrid yells, like the dissonant shrieks of different animals He was no sooner born, than, to avenge the death of his brothers the giants, he made war against heaven, and so frightened the gods that they fled away and assumed different shapes Jupiter became a ram, Mercury an ibis, Apollo a crow, Juno a cow, Bacchus a goat, Diana a cat, Venus a fish, &c The father of the gods at last resumed courage and put Typhoeus to flight with his thunderbolts, and crushed him under mount Aetna, in the island of Sicily, or, according to some, under the island Inarime. Typhoeus became father of Geryon, Cerberus, and Orthos, by his union with Echidna Hygin fab 152 et 196. Ovid Met 5, 325. Aeschyl Sept ante Theb Hesiod, Theog 820. Homer. Hymn. Hesod 2 *Lib. [Vid Typhoeus.]—A brother of Osiris, who married Nepthys He laid snares for his brother during his expedition, and murdered him at his return. The death of Osiris was avenged by his son Orus, and Typhon was put to death [Vid Osiris.] He was reckoned among the Aegyptians to be the cause of every evil, and on that account generally represented as a wolf and a crocodile. Plut in Is. et Os.

TYRANNIO, a grammarian of Amisa in Pontus, intimate with Cicero. His original name was Theophrastus, and he received that of Tyrannio, from his austerity to his pupils. He was taken by Lucullus, and restored to his liberty by Murena. He opened a school in the house of his friend Cicero, and enjoyed his friendship He was extremely fond of books, and collected a library of about 30,000 volumes. To his care and industry the world is indebted for the preservation of Aristotle's works —There was also one of his disciples called Dorotheus, who bore his name. He was a native of Phoenicia, and was made prisoner in the war of Augustus and Antony. He was bought by Dymes, one of the emperor's favourites, and afterwards by Terentia, who gave him his liberty. He wrote sixty-eight different volumes, in one of which he proved that the Latin tongue was derived from the Greek; and another in which Homer's poems were corrected, &c.

TYRAS, another name for the Danastus or Dniester. It rises from a lake amid the Carpathian mountains in Austrian Gallicia, and, after a south-easterly course of about 600 miles, enters the Black Sea near Odessa. Upon its banks dwelled the Tyritæ or Tyragitæ, who are thought to have derived their name from TIRAS, a son of Japhet. Ovid. ex Pont. 4, 10, 50.

TYRO, a beautiful nymph, daughter of Salmoneus, king of Elis, and Alcidice. She was treated with great severity by her mother-in-law Sidero, and at last removed from her father's house by her uncle Cretheus. She became enamoured of the Enipeus; and as she often walked on the banks of the river, Neptune assumed the shape of her favoured lover, and gained her affections. She had two sons, Pelias and Neleus, by Neptune, whom she exposed, to conceal her incontinence from the world. The children were preserved by shepherds, and when they had arrived to years of maturity, they avenged their mother's injuries by assassinating the cruel Sidero. Some time after her amour with Neptune, Tyro married her uncle Cretheus, by whom she had Amythaon, Pheres, and Æson. Tyro is often called Salmonis from her father. Homer. Od. 11, 234. *Pind. TYRRHENI, the inhabitants of Etruria. Vid. Hetruria.

TYRRHENUM MARE, that part of the Mediterranean which lies on the coast of Etruria. It is also called Inferum, as being at the bottom or south of Italy.

TYRRHENUS, a son of Atys, king of Lydia, brother to Lydus. In the time of a great scarcity the lot decided which of the two brothers should leave his native country, and Tyrrhenus, obliged to yield, came to Italy, where part of the country was called after him. Tacit. Ann. 4, 55.—Paterc. 1, 1.

TYRRHEUS, a shepherd of king Latinus, whose stag being killed by the companions of Ascanius, was the first cause of war between Æneas and the inhabitants of Latium. Lavinia afterwards took refuge in his house, and there gave birth to Sylvius, who became king of Alba. Hence the word Tyrrheides Virg. Æn. 6, 760. 7, 485.

TYRTÆUS, a Greek poet, celebrated for his martial strains, is said to have been born at Miletus, but to have settled at Athens in the capacities of a poet, musician, and school-master. He is described as being short and deformed, blind of one eye, and lame; but with these bodily defects he possessed a manly and elevated soul. In the war between the Lacedæmonians and the Messenians, the former, having met with some ill success, consulted the oracle of Delphi, B.C. 683, by which they were directed to apply to Athens for a general. The Athenians, as some suppose in derision, sent them Tyrtæus, who, by reciting, as well before the magistrates, as to all who would listen to him, poems in praise of valour and patriotism, so animated the Spartans, that at length they became victorious, and reduced the Messenians to subjection. Besides the merit of his poetry, he is related to have given useful advice as a military leader; and the Spartans recognised their obligations to him by granting him the right of citizenship, and treating him with honour when he took up his residence among them. The war-poems of Tyrtæus must have been in high reputation among the ancients, for Horace joins him with Homer in this department. Besides these, he composed "Moral Precepts," and a work "On the Polity of the Lacedæmonians." Some fragments of his war-poems remain, which are characterised by a masculine simplicity. They have been published with the other minor Greek poets.

TYRUS, or TYROS, a very ancient city of Phœnicia, built by the Sidonians. Its Hebrew name is Tsor or Zor, which signifies a rock. The city of Tyre was allotted to the tribe of Asher, with the other maritime cities of the same coast; but it does not appear that the Asherites ever drove out the Canaanites. Isaiah calls Tyre the daughter of Sidon; that is, a colony from it. Homer never speaks of Tyre, but only of Sidon. Josephus says, that Tyre was built not above two hundred and forty years before the temple of Solomon; which would be in the year of the world 2760, two hundred years after Joshua. Tyre was twofold, insular and continental. Insular Tyre was certainly the most ancient, for it was noticed by Joshua; the continental city, however, as being more commodiously situated, first grew into consideration, and assumed the name of Palæ-Tyrus, or Old Tyre. Want of sufficient attention to this distinction has embarrassed both the Tyrian chronology and geography. Insular Tyre was confined to a small rocky island, eight hundred paces long and four hundred broad, and could never exceed two miles in circumference. But Tyre, on the opposite coast, about half a mile from the sea, was a city of vast extent, since, many centuries after its demolition by Nebuchadnezzar, the scattered ruins measured nineteen miles round, as we learn from Pliny and Strabo. Of these, the most curious and surprising are, the cisterns of Pas-el-Ain, designed to supply the city with water; of which there are three still entire, about one or two furlongs from the sea, so well described by Maundrell, for their curious construction and solid masonry. Old Tyre withstood the mighty Assyrian power, having been besieged in vain, by Shalmaneser, for five years, although he cut off their supplies of water from the cisterns, which they remedied by digging wells within the city. It afterwards held out for thirteen years against Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, and was at length taken; but not until the Tyrians had removed their effects to the insular town, and left nothing but the bare walls to the victor, which he demolished. What completed the destruction of the city was, that Alexander afterwards made use of these materials to build a prodigious causeway, or isthmus, above half a mile long, to the insular city, which revived, as the phœnix, from the ashes of the old, and grew to great power and opulence, as a maritime state; and which he stormed after a most obstinate siege of five months. Pococke observes, that "there are no signs of the ancient city; and as it is a sandy shore, the face of every thing is altered, and the great aqueduct is in many parts almost buried in the sand." Thus has been fulfilled the prophecy of Ezekiel, "Thou shalt be built no more: though thou be sought for, yet shalt thou never be found again." The fate of insular Tyre has been no less remarkable; when Alexander stormed the city, he set fire to it. This circumstance was foretold: "Tyre did build herself a strong hold, and heaped up silver as the dust, and fine gold as the mire of the streets. Behold the Lord will cast her out, and he will smite her power in the sea, and she shall be destroyed with fire." After this terrible calamity, Tyre again retrieved her losses. Only eighteen years after, she had recovered such a share of her ancient commerce and opulence, as enabled her to stand a siege of fourteen months against Antigonus, before he could reduce the city. After this, Tyre fell alternately under the dominion of the kings of Syria and Egypt, and then of the Romans, until it was taken by the Saracens, about A.D. 639; retaken by the Crusaders, A.D. 1124; and at length sacked and razed by the Mamelukes of Egypt, with Sidon, and other strong towns, that they might no longer harbour the Christians, A.D. 1291. Josh. 19, 29. - Is. 23, 12 — Ezek. 26, 21. - Zech 9 3 et 4 — Plin 9, 36. - Strab. 16. Virg Æn. 1, v. 339, &c. - *Ovid. VACATIONE (lex de) was enacted concerning the exemption from military service, and contained this very remarkable clause, nisi bellum Gallicum exoriatur, in which case the priests themselves were not exempted from service. This can intimate how apprehensive the Romans were of the Gauls, by whom their city had once been taken.

VACCA, or VAGA, now Beja, a town of Africa, west of Carthage on the river Rubricatus, and remarkable among the African and Numidian cities for its extensive traffic. During the Jugurthine war it declared for the Romans, but having afterwards risen against the garrison and murdered them, it was destroyed by Metellus. Sallust. Jug. 47.— Bell. Ital. 3. 259.

VACCÆI a people at the north of Spain, occupying parts of Leon and Old Castile. Liv. 21, 5. 35, 7.

VACUNA, a goddess at Rome, who presided over repose and leisure, as the word indicates (vacare). Her festivals were observed in the month of December. Ovid. Fast. 6, 307.— Horat. Ep. 1, 10, 49.

VADIMÔNIS LACUS, a lake of Etruria, which formerly existed close to Bracciano, but is now filled up with peat and rushes. It is celebrated in the history of Rome for having witnessed the total defeat of the Etrurians by the Romans, B.C. 310, a defeat so decisive that they never could recover from its effects. Another battle was fought here by the Etrurians, in conjunction with the Gauls, against the Romans, with the same ill success. Plin. 2, 95.— Liv. 9, 39.— Polyb. 2, 20. Flor. 1, 12.

VAGA. Vid. Vacca.

VAGENI, or VAGIENNI, a people of Liguria, in the interior of the country, and near the angle formed by the separation of the Apennines and Alps. Their chief city was Augusta Vagiennorum, now Bene. Bel. Ital. 8, 607.— Plin 3, 5.

VAHALIS, the western branch of the Rhine, now the Whaal. Tacit. Ann. 2, 6.

VALENS, FLAVIUS, a son of Gratian, born in Pannonia His brother Valentinian took him as his colleague on the throne, and appointed him over the eastern parts of the Roman empire The bold measures and the threats of the rebel Procopius, frightened the new emperor; and if his friends had not interfered, he would have willingly resigned all his pretensions to the empire, which his brother had entrusted to his care. By perseverance, however, Valens was enabled to destroy his rival, and to distinguish himself in his wars against the northern barbarians. But his lenity to these savage intruders proved fatal to the Roman power; and by permitting some of the Goths to settle in the provinces of Thrace, and to have free access to every part of the country, Valens encouraged them to make depredations on his subjects, and to disturb their tranquillity. His eyes were opened too late; he attempted to repel them, but he failed in the attempt. A bloody battle was fought, in which the barbarians obtained some advantage, and Valens was hurried away by the obscurity of the night, and the affection of the soldiers for his person, into a lonely house, which the Goths set on fire. Valens, unable to make his escape, was burnt alive in the 50th year of his age, after a reign of fifteen years, A.D. 378. He has been blamed for his superstition and cruelty, in putting to death all such of his subjects whose name began by Theod, because he had been informed by his favourite astrologers that his crown would devolve upon the head of an officer whose name began with these letters. Valens did not possess any of the great qualities which distinguish a good and powerful monarch. He was illiterate, and of a disposition naturally indolent and inactive. Yet though timorous in the highest degree, he was warlike; and though fond of ease, he was acquainted with the character of his officers, and preferred none but such as possessed merit. He was a great friend of discipline, a pattern of chastity and temperance, and he showed himself always ready to listen to the just complaints of his subjects, though he gave an attentive ear to flattery and malevolent informations. Ammian, &c.—— Valerius, a proconsul of Achaia, who proclaimed himself emperor of Rome, when Marcian, who had been invested with the purple in the east, attempted to assassinate him. He reigned only six months, and was murdered by his soldiers, A.D 261.

VALENTIA, a secret and hallowed name of Rome. Plin. 3, 5. 28, 2.——A city of the Segalauni, in Gallia Narbonensis, on the banks of the Rhodanus. It is now Valence Plin. 3, 4.——A province of Britain, in what is now Scotland, conquered in the time of Valentinian from the Picts and Scots, and formed by Theodosius into a province, Amm. Marc. 28, 3.——A city of the Edetani, or Contestani, in Hispania Terraconensis, near the mouth of the Turia. It was assigned by Junius Brutus to the troops who had served under Viriatus, and was destroyed by Pompey in the Sertorian war, but was afterwards restored and colonised by Julius Cæsar. It is now Valencia.

VALENTINIANUS 1st, a son of Gratian, raised to the imperial throne by his merit and valour. He kept the western part of the empire for himself, and appointed over the east his brother Valens. He gave the most convincing proof of his military valour in the victories which he obtained over the barbarians in the provinces of Gaul, the deserts of Africa, and on the banks of the Rhine and the Danube. The insolence of the Quadi he punished with great severity, and when these desperate and indigent barbarians had deprecated the conqueror's mercy, Valentinian treated them with contempt, and upbraided them with every mark of resentment. While he spoke with such warmth, he broke a blood vessel, and fell lifeless on the ground. He was conveyed into his palace by his attendants, and soon after died, after suffering the greatest agonies, violent fits, and contortions of his limbs, on the 17th of November, A.D. 375. He was then in the 55th year of his age, and had reigned 12 years. He has been represented by some as cruel and covetous in the highest degree. He was naturally of an irascible disposition, and he gratified his pride in expressing a contempt for those who were his equals in military abilities, or who shone for gracefulness or elegance of address. Ammian.——About six days after the death of Valentinian, his second son, Valentinian the second, was proclaimed emperor, though only five years old. He succeeded his brother Gratian, A.D. 383, but his youth seemed to favour dissension, and the attempts and the usurpations of rebels. He was robbed of his throne by Maximus, four years after the death of Gratian; and in this helpless situation he had recourse to Theodosius, who was then emperor of the east. He was successful in his applications, Maximus was conquered by Theodosius, and Valentinian entered Rome in triumph, accompanied by his benefactor. He was some time after strangled by one of his officers, a native of Gaul, called Arbogastes, in whom he had placed too much confidence, and from whom he expected more deference than the ambition of a barbarian could pay. Valentinian reigned nine years. This happened the 15th of May, A.D 392, at Vienne, one of the modern towns of France. He has been commended for his many virtues, and the applause which the populace bestowed upon him, was bestowed upon real merit. He abolished the greatest part of the taxes; and because his subjects complained that he was too fond of the amusements of the circus, he ordered all such festivals to be abolished, and all the wild beasts that were kept for the entertainment of the people to be slain. He was remarkable for his benevolence and clemency, not only to his friends, but even to such as had conspired against his life; and he used to say, that tyrants alone are suspicious. He was fond of imitating the virtues and exemplary life of his friend and patron Theodosius, and if he had lived longer, the Romans might have enjoyed peace and security.——Valentinian the third, was the son of Constantius and Placidia, the daughter of Theodosius the Great, and therefore, as related to the imperial family, he was saluted emperor in his youth, and publicly acknowledged as such at Rome, the 3d of October, A.D. 423, about the 6th year of his age. He was at first governed by his mother, and the intrigues of his generals and courtiers, and when he came to years of discretion, he disgraced himself by violence, oppression, and incontinence. He was murdered in the midst of Rome, A.D 454, in the 36th year of his age, and 31st of his reign, by Petronius Maximus, to whose wife he had offered violence. The vices of Valentinian the third were conspicuous, every passion he wished to gratify at the expense of his honour, his health, and character, and as he lived without one single act of benevolence or kindness, he died lamented by none, though pitied for his imprudence and vicious propensities. He was the last of the family of Theodosius.——A son of the emperor Gratian, who died when very young.

VALERIA, a sister of Publicola, who advised the Roman matrons to go and deprecate the resentment of Coriolanus. Plut. in Cor.——A daughter of Publicola, given as an hostage to Porsenna, by the Romans. She fled from the enemy's country with Cloelia, and swam across the Tiber. Plut. de Virt. Mul.——A daughter of Messala, sister to Hortensius, who married Sylla.——The wife of the emperor Valentinian.——The wife of the emperor Galerius, &c.——A road in Sicily, which led from Messana to Lilybæum.

VALERIA LEX, de provocatione, by P. Valerius Poplicola, the sole consul A.U.C. 243. It permitted the appeal from a magistrate to the people, and forbade the magistrate to punish a citizen for making the appeal. It further made it a capital crime for a citizen to aspire to the sovereignty of Rome, or to exercise any office without the choice and approbation of the people. Val. Max. 4 1. Liv. 2, 8.—Dion. Hal. 4.——Another, de debitoribus, by Valerius Flaccus. It required that all creditors should discharge their debtors, on receiving a fourth part of the whole sum.——Another by M. Valerius Corvinus, A.U.C. 453, which confirmed the first Valerian law, ensured by Poplicola.——Another, called also Horatia, by L. Valerius and M. Horatius the consuls, A.U.C. 304. It revived the first Valerian law, which under the triumvirate had lost its force.——Another, de magistratibus, by P. Valerius Poplicola, sole consul, A.U.C. 248. It created two quæstors to take care of the public treasure, which was for the future to be kept in the temple of Saturn. Plut. in Pop.

VALERIANUS, PUBLIUS LICINIUS a Roman, proclaimed emperor by the armies in Rhætia, A.D. 254. The virtues which shone in him, when a private man, were lost when he ascended the throne. Formerly distinguished for his temperance, moderation, and many virtues, which fixed the unanimous choice of all Rome upon him, Valerian, invested with the purple, displayed inability and meanness. He was cowardly in his operations, and, though acquainted with war, and the patron of science, he seldom acted with prudence, or favoured men of true genius and merit. He took his son, Gallienus, as his colleague in the empire, and showed the malevolence of his heart by persecuting the Christians whom he had for a while tolerated. He also made war against the Goths and Scythians; but in an expedition which he undertook against Sapor, king of Persia, his arms were attended with ill success. He was conquered in Mesopotamia, and when he wished to have a private conference with Sapor, the conqueror seized his person, and carried him in triumph to his capital, where he exposed him, and in all the cities of his empire, to the ridicule and insolence of his subjects. When the Persian monarch mounted on horseback, Valerian served as a footstool; and the many other insults which he suffered, excited indignation even among the courtiers of Sapor. The monarch at last ordered him to be flayed alive, and salt to be thrown over his mangled body, so that he died in the greatest torments. His skin was tanned, and painted in red; and, that the ignominy of the Roman empire might be lasting, it was nailed in one of the temples of Persia. Valerian died in the 71st year of his age, A.D. 260, after a reign of seven years.——A grandson of Valerian the emperor. He was put to death, when his father, the emperor Gallienus, was killed.——One of the generals of the usurper Niger.

VALERIUS PUBLIUS, a celebrated Roman, surnamed Poplicola, from his popularity. He was very active in assisting Brutus to expel the Tarquins, and he was the first who took an oath to support the liberty and independence of his country. Though he had been refused the consulship, and had retired with great dissatisfaction from the direction of affairs, yet he regarded the public opinion; and when the jealousy of the Romans inveighed against the towering appearance of his house, he acknowledged the reproof, and in pulling it down, he showed his wish to be on a level with his fellow-citizens, and not to erect what might be considered as a citadel for the oppression of his country. He was afterwards honoured with the consulship, on the expulsion of Collatinus and he triumphed over the Etrurians, after he had gained the victory in the battle in which Brutus and the sons of Tarquin had fallen. Valerius died after he had been four times consul, and enjoyed the popularity, and received the thanks and the gratitude, which a people redeemed from slavery and oppression usually pay to their patrons and deliverers. He was so poor, that his body was buried at the public expense. The Roman matrons mourned his death a whole year. Plut. in Vita.— Flor. 1, 9.— Liv. 3, 8, &c ——Corvinus, a tribune of the soldiers under Camillus. When the Roman army were challenged by one of the Senones, remarkable for his strength and stature Valerius undertook to engage him, and obtained an easy victory, by means of a crow that assisted him, and attacked the face of the Gaul, whence his surname of Corvinus. Valerius triumphed over the Etrurians, and the neighbouring states that made war against Rome, and was six times honoured with the consulship. He died in the 100th year of his age, admired and regretted for many public and private virtues. Val. Max. 8, 13.— Liv. 7, 27, &c.— Plut. in Mar.—Cic. in Cat.—— Antias, an excellent Roman historian, in the age of Marius and Sylla, often quoted, and particularly by Livy.——Marcus Corvinus Messala. [Vid. Messala.]——A Roman historian, usually called Valerius Maximus, born at Rome, during the reign of Augustus, of a patrician family. He served in Asia under Sextus Pompeius, who was consul in the year of the death of Augustus; and returning to Rome, he appears to have taken no part in public affairs. He devoted his leisure to the composition of a work entitled Dictorum factorumque memorabilium libri IX, which is a collection of anecdotes and observations, comprising some curious facts and details, recorded by no other ancient writer. It is dedicated to Tiberius in terms of high eulogy. It is cited by Pliny the elder, Plutarch, and A. Gellius; and few books were more read and quoted at the revival of literature in Europe. The best editions of Valerius Maximus are, that of Vorstius, 8vo. Bercl. 1672, that of Torrenius, 4to. L. Bat. 1726; and that of Kappius, 8vo. Lips 1782.——Marcus, a brother of Poplicola, who defeated the army of the Sabines in two battles. He was honoured with a triumph, and the Romans, to show their sense of his great merit, built him a house on mount Palatine, at the public expense.——Potitus, a general who stirred the people and arms against the decemvirs, and Appius Claudius in particular. He was chosen consul, and conquered the Volsci and Æqui.——Flaccus, a Roman, intimate with Cato the censor, whose friendship he honourably shared. He was consul with him, and cut off an army of 10,000 of the Insubres and Boii in Gaul, in one battle. He was also chosen censor, and prince of the senate, &c.——A Latin poet, who flourished in the reign of Vespasian, and died at an early age, in the time of Domitian. From an epigram in Martial, it would appear that he was in no affluent condition, for he advises him as a friend to quit the muses for the more gainful pursuits of the forum. The work on which his fame rests as a poet is entitled "Argonauticon," in eight books. It is an imitation of the Greek poem of Apollonius Rhodius on the same subject, and may rank among the most respectable of the Latin epics after the Æneid, the manner and style of which he aims at copying. It contains sublime and splendid passages, and is free from the bombast and extravagance of most of the second race of Latin poets; but it is in general deficient in poetical spirit, and is likewise wanting in plan and contrivance. The best editions of Valerius Flaccus are, that of Burmann, 4to. L. Bat. 1724; that of Harles, 8vo. Altenb. 1781; that of Wagner, 8vo. Gotting. 1805; and that of Weichert, 8vo. Mis. ap. Geod. 1818.——Asiaticus, a celebrated Roman, accused of having murdered one of the relations of the emperor Claudius. He was condemned by the intrigues of Messalina, though innocent, and he opened his veins, and died to death. Tacit. Ann. ——Lævinus, a consul, who fought against Pyrrhus during the Tarentine war. Vid. Lævinus.

VALGIUS RUFUS, a Roman poet in the Augustine age, celebrated for the elegance and happy turn of his poetry. He was intimate with Horace, Tibullus, and other great men, and the wits of the age, and was considered as highly capable to celebrate the wars, the heroic actions, and superior eloquence of his friend Messala Corvinus. He has, however, been so-cused of ignorance, in saying that Ætna was the only volcano in the world. Only five verses remain of his poetry. Tibull. 3, 1, 180.—Horat. Sat 1, 10, 82.

VANDALII, a nation of Europe, whose original seat appears to have been the banks of the Oder, and the maritime parts of Pomerania and Mecklenburg. Gibbon supposes the Vandals and the Goths to have been originally one great people; but the latter were a Scandinavian nation, while the former, the parent nation of the Burgundians and Lombards, would seem to have belonged to the Slavonic family In the country between the Elbe and the Oder, several populous villages of Lusatia are inhabited by the reputed descendants of the ancient Vandals, who still preserve their peculiar language and customs, and the purity of their blood. Gibbon, however, infers from their Slavonian dialect, that they are the remnant of a colony who succeeded to the genuine Vandals already scattered and destroyed in the age of Procopius. Dio Cass. 71, 12.—Ruhnop. 8, 13. - Procop B G. 1, 2.—Tacit Germ. 2.

VANGIONES, a German tribe along the Rhine. Their chief town was Borbetomagus, called also Vangiones, now Worms. Tacit Hist. 4, 70 Germ 28. Lucan 1, 431.

VARANES, a name common to some of the Persian monarchs in the age of the Roman emperors VARDANUS, a river of Asia, called otherwise Hypanis, which rises on the northern side of Caucasus, and runs into the Palus Mæotis by several mouths. Some traces of its old name may be observed in its modern one of Kuban. Ptol.

VARIA LEX, de majestate, by the tribune L. Varius, A. U. C. 662. It ordained that all such as had assisted the confederates in their war against Rome, should be publicly tried.——Another, de civitate, by Q. Varius Hybrida It punished all such as were suspected of having assisted or supported the people of Italy in their petition to become free citizens of Rome. Cic. pro Mil. 36 in Brut. 56, 58, &c.

VARIUS LUCIUS, a tragic poet, intimate with Horace and Virgil. He was one of those whom Augustus appointed to revise Virgil's Æneid. Besides tragedies, he wrote a panegyric on the emperor, and, indeed, so highly were his abilities esteemed, that Horace, not less in the language of truth than of partiality, declares, that he was the only poet capable to celebrate the heroic achievements and illustrious character of M. Agrippa. Among his tragedies his Thyestes has been particularly mentioned by Quintilian as a most happy effusion, as possessing all the elegance, the pathos, and sublimity which we admire on the Grecian stage. Only thirteen verses of all his compositions have survived the ravages of time, and they seem little inferior to the finished lines of his friend and favourite Virgil. Virg Ecl 6 10. 9, 26 – Quintil. 10.— Horat. Sat. 1, 5, 40.— Martial. 8 17. 12. 4.—— One of the friends of Antony, surnamed Ocylon.

VARRO, M. TERRENTIUS, a Roman consul defeated at Cannæ, by Annibal. [Vid. Terentius.]——Marcus Terentius, the most learned of the ancient Romans, began with serving his country in various considerable posts, and was presented with a naval crown by Pompey the Great, in the piratical war. He joined the party of that chief in the civil war against Cæsar, but soon submitted to the latter; and was so much esteemed by him for his learning and judgment, that when he adopted the design of forming a public library at Rome, he fixed upon Varro as the person to whom the collection of books was to be confided. The death of Cæsar interrupted this design, and in the succeeding troubles Varro was involved in the proscription by the triumvirates, from which he escaped with life, but with the loss and dispersion of his library. On the restoration of tranquility, he entirely devoted himself to his studies in retirement, for the remainder of a long life, continuing to compose books as late as his 88th year. He survived to the age of 90, and died about B C. 27. He is highly extolled for his various talents and literary performances by ancient writers, and particularly by Cicero in his "Academics." Aulus Gellius cites a passage from Varro, in which he declares of himself, that to the 78th year of his life he had composed 490 books; and he continued to write to his 90th year. The subjects on which he wrote were grammar, eloquence, poetry, the drama, history, antiquities, philosophy, politics, agriculture, nautical affairs, architecture, and religion. He was also the first Latin author of the species of satire called the Menippean, from Menippus, a Greek, its inventor, and which was written in prose with a mixture of verse in different measures. Such and so pre-eminent was the reputation of Varro, that when Asinius Pollio, in the reign of Augustus, opened the first public library at Rome, and placed in it the effigies of various learned persons, he was the only living writer who had the honour of this distinction. The only relics of his numerous works are six books, in an imperfect state, out of twenty-four, which he composed on the Latin language, with three books on agriculture and a few fragments of his satires and epigrams The best edition of the treatise de re rustica, is that contained in the Scriptores Rei Rustice of Gesner, 2 vols. 4to. Lips 1735; or in the same edited by Schneider, 7 vols. 8vo Lips. 1794—97. The best edition of the treatise de lingua Latina is that printed at Dordrecht, 8vo. 1619. — P Terent. surnamed Atacinus, because born near the Atax or Aude, a river of Gallia Narbonensis, flourished in the age of Julius Cæsar. He translated into Latin verse the Argonautics of Apollonius Rhodius, with great correctness and elegance. He also wrote a poem entitled de bello Sequanico, besides epigrams and an elegiac poem in which he celebrated the beauty and accomplishments of his favourite Leucadia. Some fragments of his poetry are still extant to the number of only 12 He failed in his attempts to write satire. Horat. Sat. 1, 10, 46.—Ovid. Ars. 1, 15.—Quint. 10. 1.

VARUS, QUINTILIUS, a Roman proconsul, descended from an illustrious family. He was appointed governor of Syria, and afterwards made commander of the armies in Germany. He was surprised by the enemy, under Arminius, a crafty and dissimulating chief, and his army was cut to pieces. When he saw that every thing was lost, he killed himself, A. D 10, and his example was followed by some of his officers. His head was afterwards sent to Augustus, at Rome, by one of the barbarian chiefs, as also his body; and so great was the influence of this defeat upon the emperor, that he continued for whole months to show all the marks of dejection, and of deep sorrow, often exclaiming, "O Varus, restore me my legions!" The bodies of the slain were left in the field of battle, where they were found six years after by Germanicus, and buried with great pomp. Varus has been taxed with indolence and cowardice, and some have intimated, that if he had not trusted too much to the insinuations of the barbarian chiefs, he might have not only escaped ruin, but awed the Germans to their duty. His avarice was also conspicuous; he went poor to Syria, whence he returned loaded with riches. Horat Od. 1, 24.—Paterc. 2 117.—Flor. 4, 12. Virg Ecl. 6.—A son of Varus, who married a daughter of Germanicus. Tacit. Ann 4, 6 ——The father and grandfather of Varus, who was killed in Germany, slew themselves with their own swords, the one after the battle of Philippi, and the other in the plains of Pharsalia.—— Quintilius, a friend of Horace, and other great men in the Augustan age He was a good judge of poetry, and a great critic, as Horace, Art P. 438, seems to insinuate. The poet has addressed the 18th ode of his first book to him, and in the 24th he mourns pathetically his death Some suppose this Varus to be the person killed in Germany, while others believe him to be a man who devoted his time more to the muses than to war. ——Lucius, an Epicurean philosopher, intimate with Julius Cæsar. Some suppose that it was to him that Virgil inscribed his sixth eclogue. He is commended by Quintil. 6, 3, 78 ——Alfenus, a barber of Cremona, who, growing out of conceit with his profession quitted it, and came to Rome, where, attending the lectures of Servius Sulpicius, a celebrated lawyer, he made no great proficiency in his studies, as to become eventually the ablest lawyer of his time. His name often occurs in the Pandects. He obtained the consulship A U. C 755. Horat. Sat 1, 3, 130. —— A river, which falls into the Mediterranean, to the west of Nice, after separating Liguria from Gallia Narbonensis, now the Var. Lucan. 1, 404.

VASCONES, a people of Spain, between the Iberus and the Pyrenees, in what is now the kingdom of Navarre. They subsequently passed into Gaul, where they have left their name, though something corrupted, in the province of Gascony. Their chief city was Pompelo, now Pampelunn Plin. 3, 3.

VATICANUS, a hill at Rome, near the Tiber and the Janiculum, which produced wine of no great esteem. It was supposed to derive its name from the Latin word vates, as it was once the seat of Etruscan divinations. It was disregarded by the Romans on account of the unwholesomeness of the air, and the continual stench of the filth that was there, and of stagnated waters. Heliogabalus was the first who cleared it of all disagreeable nuisances. It is now admired for ancient monuments and pillars, for a celebrated public library, and for the palace of the pope. Horat. Od. 1, 20.

VATIENUS, now Saterno, a river rising in the Alps, and falling into the Po. Martial. 3, 67.—Plin 3 16.

VATINIA LEX de provinciis, by the tribune P. Vatinius, A U.C. 694. It appointed Cæsar governor of Gallia Cisalpina and Illyricum, for five years, without a decree of the senate, or the usual edatom of casting lots. Some PETELLS were also appointed to attend him as lieutenants without the interference of the senate. His army was to be paid out of the public treasury, and he was empowered to plant a Roman colony in the town of Novocomum, in Gaul. ——Another by P. Vatinius, the tribune, A. U.C. 694, de repetundis, for the better management of the trials of those who were accused of extortion.

VATINIUS, an intimate friend of Cicero, once distinguished for his comity to the orator. He hated the people of Rome for their great vices and corruption, whence excessive hatred became proverbial in the words Vatinianum odium. Catull. 14, 3 ——A shoemaker, ridiculed for his great deformities, and the oddity of his character He was one of Nero's favourites, and he surpassed the rest of the courtiers in flattery, and in the commission of every impious deed. Large cups, of no value, are called Vatinians from him, because he used one which was both ill-shaped and uncouth. Tacit Ann 13, 34.—Juv. Mart. 14, 96.

UBII, a people of Germany near the Rhine, transported across the river by Agrippa, who gave them the name of Agrippinenses, from his daughter Agrippina, who had been born in the country Their chief town, Obiorum oppidum, or Ara is now Cologne. Tacit. G. 28. Ann. 12, 27 — Plin. 4, 17. Cæs. 4, 30.

UCALEGON, a Trojan chief, remarkable for his great age, and praised for the soundness of his counsels and his good intentions, though accused by some of betraying his country to the enemy. His house was first set on fire by the Greeks. Virg Æn. 2, 312.— Hom. Il. 3, 148.

VECTIS, the Isle of Wight, south of Britain. It was reduced by Vespasian, during the reign of Claudius, and was known to the Romans in a very early period, from the trade in tin or white lead having been here carried on between the Gauls and the inhabitants of the Cassiterides. Suet. Vesp. 4.— Plin. 3, 4.

VEDIUS POLLIO, a friend of Augustus, very cruel to his servants, &c. Vid. Pollio.

VEGETIUS, Flavius Renatus, a Latin writer of the 4th century, lived in the reign of one of the emperors Valentinian, to whom he dedicated the work of his which has come down to our times, entitled de re militari. It can scarcely be doubted that he was a military man; and in several manuscripts of his work, the title of count is adhered to his name. He writes in a style remarkably pure for that age, and treats with much exactness concerning the military system of the Romans, collecting his facts from various authors. Of the editions of Vegetius, the best is that of Stewechius, Vasel. 1670.—— Publius, who, notwithstanding the difference of prænomen, has been carelessly confounded with the military tactician, was a writer on farriery. This work, entitled artis veterinariæ sive mulomedicinæ libri iv. was first printed at Basil in 1528; but the best edition is that of Gesner, in the Scriptores rei rusticæ.

VEIENTES, the inhabitants of Veii. They were carried to Rome, where the tribe they composed was called Veientina. Vid. Veii.

VEIENTO, Fabr. a Roman, as arrogant as he was satirical. Nero banished him for his libellous writings. Juv. 3 185.

VEII, a powerful city of Etruria, at the distance of about 12 miles from Rome. It sus tained many long wars against the Romans, and was at last taken and destroyed by Camillus, after a siege of ten years. At the time of its destruction, Veii was larger and far more magnificent than the city of Rome. Its situation was so eligible, that the Romans, after the burning of their city by the Gauls, were long inclined to migrate there, and totally abandon their native home: and this would have been carried into execution, if not opposed by the authority and eloquence of Camillus. The site of ancient Veii answers to the spot known by the name of Il isola Farnese, and situated about a mile and a half to the north-east of the modern post-house of la Storta. Ovid. Fast. 2, 195. – Cic. de Div. 1, 44.—Horat. Sat. 2, 3, 143.—Liv. 5, 21, &c.

VEJOVIS, or VEJUPITER, a deity of ill omen at Rome. He had a temple on the Capitoline hill, built by Romulus. Some suppose that he was the same as Jupiter the infant, or in the cradle, because he was represented without thunder, or a sceptre, and had only by his side the goat Amalthea, and the Cretan nymph who fed him when young. Ovid. Fast. 3, 430.

VELABRUM, a name applied generally to all the ground lying on the left bank of the Tiber, between the base of the Capitol and the Aventine. The term is said to have been derived from veho, because this part being formerly swampy, and subject to inundation, it was necessary, at such times as it was flooded, to employ boats for the purpose of carrying passengers and goods from one hill to another. In later times, it was usual for the processions of the Circensian games to pass through the Velabrum, to the Circus Maximus. In this quarter were the shops of the oil-venders, &c. Horat. Sat. 2, 3, 229.—Ovid. Fast 6, 401.

VELIA, or ELEA, a city of Lucania, on the coast of the Mare Tyrrhenum, between the promontories of Palinurum and Posidonium, and situate about three miles from the left bank of the river Heles or Elees. It was founded by the Phocæans, after their abandonment of Alalia in Corsica. The Phocæans called the town Hyele, which the Latins afterwards changed to Velia. Velia is particularly celebrated in the annals of Grecian science for the school of philosophy, which was formed within its walls, under the auspices of Parmenides and Zeno, and which is commonly known by the name of the Eleatic sect. The situation of this place seems to have been considered very healthy; as Plutarch says that Paulus Æmilius was ordered there by his physicians, and that he derived considerable benefit from the air. Horace was also recommended to visit Velia for a disorder in his eyes. The ruins of Velia stand about half a mile from the sea, on the site now called Castelamare della Bruca. Herod. 1, 164, &c.—Cic. Acad. 2, 43.—Strab. 6.—Horat. Epist. 1, 15.

VELINA, the name of one of the Roman tribes, deriving its appellation, as is said, from the lake Velinus in the Sabine territory. It was added to the other tribes, together with the one termed Quirina, A. U. C. 513. The locality of this tribe was in the vicinity of mount Palatine. Horat. Ep. 1, 6, 52.

VELINUS, now the Velino, a river in the Sabine territory, rising in the Apennines and falling into the Nar. It occasionally overflowed its banks, and formed some small lakes before it entered the Nar. One of the lakes, and the chief of the number, was called the Lacus Velinus, now Lago de Pie di Lugo. The drainage of the stagnant waters produced by the occasional overflow of the lakes, and of the river, was first attempted by Curius Dentatus, the conqueror of the Sabines. He caused a channel to be made for the Velinus, through which the waters of that river were carried into the Nar, over a precipice of several hundred feet. This is the celebrated fall of Terni, known in Italy by the name of Caduta delle Marmore.

VELITRÆ, now Velletri, an ancient town of Latium, south east of Aricia, and on the road between Rome and Tarracina. It was always reckoned one of the most important and considerable cities of the Volsci. The inhabitants were engaged in frequent hostilities with the Romans, and revolted so often, that it became necessary to punish them with unusual severity. The walls of their town were razed, and its senators were removed to Rome, and compelled to reside in the Transtiberine part of the city, a severe fine being imposed upon any individual of their number who should be found on the other side of the river. The colony, however, planted by the Romans at Velitræ still subsisted in the reign of Claudius, as mention is made of it at that period. Its chief boast was the honour of having given birth to Augustus. Dion. Hal. 3, 41.—Liv. 8, 13.—Suet. in Aug. 6.—Sil. Ital. 8, 378.

VELLAUNODUNUM a city of the Senones, in Gallia Lugdunensis, now Beaune. Cæs. B. G. 7, 11.

VELLEDA, a woman famous among the Germans, in the age of Vespasian, and worshipped as a deity. Tacit. de Germ. 8.

VELLEIUS PATERCULUS, a Roman historian, was descended from an ancient family in Campania, which had borne various important offices in the state. He was himself a military tribune; and served under Tiberius in Germany, as commander of the cavalry, and accompanied him in all his expeditions during nine years. After having been quæstor he was nominated prætor. These are all the facts relating to the personal history of Paterculus that have come down to us. As he was a friend of Sejanus, it has been conjectured that he was involved in the ruin of that minister. Paterculus is known principally by his abridgment of the Roman history, addressed to the consul M. Vinicius, but of this work the greater part has perished, and what remains is extremely deficient, only one manuscript having been discovered. The style of this author is pure and elegant. In chronology he is more exact than was customary with most ancient writers, and he has introduced many brief but curious notices of the foundation of cities and states. In drawing characters he has rarely been excelled, sketching with a few strokes a striking and masterly likeness. He was the friend and adulator of Tiberius and Sejanus, and his attachment to monarchical power has biassed him in his representation of the actions and characters of the republican party. The best editions of Paterculus are, that of Burmann, 2 vols. 8vo. L. Bat. 1744; that of Ruhnken, 2 vols. 8vo. L. Bat. 1779; and that of Krause, 8vo. Lips. 1800.

VELOCASSES, a people of Gallia Belgica, along the northern bank of the Sequana, west of the Bellovaci, and north of the Aulerci Eburo rovicea. Their chief town was Rotomagus, now Rouen. Cæs B. G. 7, 75.—Plin. 4. 27.

VENAFRUM, now Venafro, a city of Campania, in the north east angle of the country, and near the river Vulturnus It is much celebrated in antiquity, for the excellence of the oil which its territory produced. Strab. 5.—Plin. 16, 2.—Horat. Od. 2, 6, 16. Sat. 2, 4, 69.—Martial. 13, 98.

VENEDI, or Venedæ a German tribe, on the eastern bank of the Vistula, near its mouth. They gave name to the Venedicus Sinus, off this coast, and to the Montes Venedici, or the low range of mountains between East Prussia and Poland. Tacit de Germ 46.—Plin. 4, 13.

VENETI, a people of Italy in Cisalpine Gaul, near the mouths of the Po. They were descended from a nation of Paphlagonia, [Vid. Heneti,] who settled there under Antenor some time after the Trojan war. The Venetians, who had been long a powerful and commercial nation, were originally very poor, whence a writer in the age of the Roman emperors said, they had no other fence against the waves of the sea but hurdles, no food but fish, no wealth besides their fishing boats, and no merchandise but salt Strab. 4, &c.—Liv 1, 1.—Mela, 1, 2. 2, 4. - *Cæs. VENTI. The ancients, and especially the Athenians, paid particular attention to the winds, and offered them sacrifices, as to deities intent upon the destruction of mankind by continually causing storms, tempests, and earthquakes. The winds were represented in different attitudes and forms The four principal winds were Eurus, the south-east, who is represented as a young man flying with great impetuosity, and often appearing in a playsome and wanton humour. Auster, the south wind, appeared generally as an old man with grey hair, a gloomy countenance, a head covered with clouds, a sable vesture, and dusky wings. He is the dispenser of rain, and of all heavy showers. Zephyrus is represented as the mildest of all the winds. He is young and gentle, and his lap is filled with vernal flowers. He married Flora, the goddess, with whom he enjoyed the most perfect felicity. Boreas, or the north wind, appears always rough and shivering. He is the father of rain, snow, hail, and tempests, and is always represented as surrounded with impenetrable clouds. Those of inferior note were, Solanus, whose name is seldom mentioned. He appeared as a young man holding fruit in his lap, such as peaches, oranges, &c. Africus, or south-west, is represented with black wings, and a melancholy countenance. Corus, or north-west, drives clouds of snow before him; and Aquilo, the north-east by north, is equally dreadful in appearance. The winds, according to some mythologists, were confined in a large cave, of which Æolus had the management, and without this necessary precaution they would have overturned the earth, and reduced every thing to its original chaos. Virg. Æn. 1, 57, &c.

VENTIDIUS BASSUS, a native of Asculum in Picenum, born of an obscure family. When Asculum was taken, he was carried before the triumphant chariot of Pompeius Strabo, hanging on his mother's breast. A bold, aspiring soul, aided by the patronage of the family of Cæsar, raised him from the mean occupation of a chairman and muleteer to dignity in the state. He displayed valour in the Roman armies, and gradually arose to the offices of tribune, prætor, high priest, and consul He made war against the Parthians, and conquered them in three great battles, B.C. 39. He was the first Roman ever honoured with a triumph over Parthia. He died greatly lamented by all the Roman people, and was buried at the public expense. Plut. in Anton.—Juv. 7, 199.

VENULUS, one of the Latin elders sent into Magna Græcia, to demand the assistance of Diomedes, &c. Virg. Æn. 8, 9.

VENUS, one of the most celebrated deities of the ancients. She was the goddess of beauty, the mother of love, the queen of laughter, the mistress of the graces and of pleasures, and the patroness of courtesans. Some mythologists speak of more than one Venus. Plato mentions two, Venus Urania, the daughter of Uranus, and Venus Popularia, the daughter of Jupiter and Dione. Cicero speaks of four, a daughter of Cœlus and Light, one sprung from the froth of the sea, a third, daughter of Jupiter and the Nereid Dione, and a forth born at Tyre, and the same as the Astarte of the Syrians. Of these, however, the Venus sprung from the froth of the sea, after the mutilated part of the body of Uranus had been thrown there by Saturn, is the most known, and of her in particular, ancient mythologists as well as painters, make mention. She arose from the sea near the island of Cyprus, or, according to Hesiod, of Cythera, whither she was wafted by the Zephers, and received on the sea-shore by the Seasons, daughters of Jupiter and Themis. She was soon after carried to heaven, where all the gods admired her beauty, and all the goddesses became jealous of her personal charms. Jupiter attempted her gallant affections and even wished to offer her violence, but Venus refused, and the god to punish her obstinacy, gave her in marriage to his ugly and deformed son Vulcan. This marriage did not prevent the goddess of love from gratifying her favourite passions, and she defiled her husband's bed by her amours with the gods. Her intrigue with Mars is the most celebrated. She was caught in her lover's arms, and exposed to the ridicule and laughter of all the gods. [Vid. Alectryon.] Venus became mother of Hermione, Cupid, and Anteros, by Mars; by Mercury she had Hermaphroditus; by Bacchus, Priapus; and by Neptune, Eryx. Her great partiality for Adonis made her abandon the seats of Olympus, [Vid. Adonis] and her regard for Anchises obliged her often to visit the woods and solitary retreats of mount Ida. [Vid. Anchises, Æneas.] The power of Venus over the heart was supported and assisted by a celebrated girdle, called κεστος by the Greeks, and cestus by the Latins. This mysterious girdle gave beauty, grace, and elegance, when worn even by the most deformed; and it excited love and rekindled extinguished flames. Juno herself was indebted to this powerful ornament, to gain the favours of Jupiter; and Venus, though herself possessed of every charm, no sooner put on her cestus, than Vulcan, unable to resist the influence of love, forgot all the intrigues and infidelities of his wife, and fabricated arms even for her illegitimate children. The contest of Venus for the golden apple of Discord is well known. She gained the prize over Pallas and Juno, [Vid. Paris, Discordia,] and rewarded her impartial judge with the hand of the fairest woman in the world. The worship of Venus was universally established; statues and temples were erected to her in every kingdom, and the ancients were fond of paying homage to a divinity who presided over generation, and by whose influence alone mankind existed. In her sacrifices and in the festivals celebrated in her honour, too much licentiousness prevailed, and public prostitution was often part of the ceremony. Victims were seldom offered to her, or her altars stained with blood, though we find Aspasia making repeated sacrifices. No pigs, however, or male animals were deemed acceptable. The rose, the myrtle, and the apple, were sacred to Venus; and among birds, the dove, the swan, and the sparrow, were her favourites; and among fishes, those called the aphya and the lycostomus. The goddess of beauty was represented among the ancients in different forms. At Elis she appeared seated on a goat, with one foot resting on a tortoise. At Sparta and Cythera, she was represented armed like Minerva, and sometimes wearing chains on her feet. In the temple of Jupiter Olympius, she was represented by Phidias as rising from the sea, received by love, and crowned by the goddess of persuasion. At Cnidus her statue made by Praxiteles, [Vid. Cnidus,] represented her naked, with one hand hiding what modesty keeps concealed. Her statue at Elephantis was the same, with only a naked Cupid by her side. In Sicyon she held a poppy in one hand, and in the other an apple, while on her head she had a crown, which terminated in a point, to intimate the pole. She is generally represented with her son Cupid, on a chariot drawn by doves, or at other times by swans or sparrows. The surnames of the goddess are numerous, and only serve to show how well established her worship was all over the earth. She was called Cypria, because particularly worshipped in the island of Cyprus, and in that character she was often represented with a beard, and the male parts of generation, with a sceptre in her hand, and the body and dress of a female, whence she is called duplex Amathusia by Catullus. She received the name of Paphia, because worshipped at Paphos, where she had a temple with an altar, on which rain never fell, though exposed in the open air. Some of the ancients called her Apostrophias, or Epistrophia, as also Venus Urania, and Venus Pandemos. The first of these she received as presiding over wantonness; the second because she patronised pure love, and chaste and moderate gratifications; and the third because she favoured the propensities of the vulgar, and was fond of sensual pleasures. The Cnidians raised her temples under the name of Venus Acræa, of Doris, and of Euploea. In her temple under the name of Euploea, at Cnidus, was the most celebrated of her statues, being the most perfect piece of Praxiteles. Venus was also surnamed Cytherea, because she was the chief deity of Cythera; Erycina, because her statue was without the city of Athens; Philommeda, from her affection for the phallus; Philommedes, because the queen of laughter, Telesigama, because she presided over marriage; Cohada, Colotis, or Cohas, because worshipped on a promontory of the same name in Attica; Area, because armed like Mars; Verticordia, because she could turn the hearts of women to cultivate chastity; Apaturia, because she deceived; Calva, because she was represented bald; Erucyna, because worshipped at Eryx; Etaira, because the patroness of courtezans; Acidalia, because of a fountain of Orchomenos; Basilea, because the queen of love; Myrtea, because the myrtle was sacred to her; Libertina, from her inclinations to gratify lust; Mechanitis, in allusion to the many artifices practised in love, &c. &c. As goddess of the sea, because born in the bosom of the waters, Venus was called Pontia, Marina, Limnesia, Epipontia, Pelagia, Salenna, Pontogenea, Algena, Thalassa, &c.; and as rising from the sea, the name of Anadyomene is applied to her, and rendered immortal by the celebrated painting of Apelles, which represented her as issuing from the bosom of the waves, and wringing her tresses on her shoulder. VENUSIA, now Venosa, a city of Apulia, on the great Appian Way, leading to Tarentum, and about fifteen miles to the south of the Aufidus. This place appears to have been a Roman colony of some importance before the war against Pyrrhus. After the disaster at Cannæ it afforded a retreat to the consul Varro, and the handful of men who escaped from that bloody field. The services rendered by the Venusini on that occasion, obtained for them afterwards the special thanks of the Roman senate. Venusia deserves our attention still more, from the associations which connect it with the name of Horace, who was born there A.U.C. 688. Vell. Paterc. 1, 14. — Horat. Sat. 2, 1, 35. — Liv. 22, 54. 27, 10. Strab 5.

VERAGRI, an Alpine tribe, living among the Graian and Pennine Alps. Their capital was Octodurus, now Martigny. Plin. 3, 20.

VERANIUS, a governor of Britain under Nero. He succeeded Didius Gallus. Tac. Ann. 14.

VERBANUS LACUS, now Lago Maggiore, a lake of Gallia Cisalpina, through which flows the river Ticinus. The Lago Maggiore lies partly in Switzerland, but principally in Italy. Its dimensions have been very differently stated; but it would appear to be between fifty and sixty miles in length, and from five to six in breadth. Plin. 3, 19.—Strab. 4.

VERCELLÆ, a city of Gallia Cisalpina, to the north-west of Ticinum, and the capital of the Libeci. It was situate on the river Sesaites, now the Sesia, and its site corresponds with that of the modern Borgo Vercelli. Plin. 3, 17.— Cic. Fam. 1, 19.—Sil. Ital. 8, 598.

VERCINGETÓRIX, a celebrated chief of the Gauls, in the time of Cæsar. By his powerful influence the nations of Gaul united to shake off the Roman yoke, but the superior valour and fortune of Cæsar prevailed, and Vercingetorix, after severe losses, surrendered himself up at Alesia to the conqueror, who, after dragging him in chains to adorn his triumph, ordered him, with a cruelty unworthy of his fame, to be put to death. Flor. 3, 10.— *Cæs. VERGELLUS, a small river near Cannæ, falling into the Aufidus, over which Annibal made a bridge with the slaughtered bodies of the Romans. Flor. 2, 6 Val. Max 9, 4

VERGILIÆ, seven stars, called also Pleiades. When they set, the ancients began to sow their corn. They received their name from the spring quia vere oriantur. Propert. 1, 8, 18.— Cic. de Nat D. 2, 44.

VERGINIUS, one of the officers of the Roman troops in Germany, who refused the absolute power which his soldiers offered to him. Tacit. Hist. 1, 8.—— A rhetorician in the age of Nero, banished on account of his great fame. Id. Ann. 15, 71.

VERGOBRÉTUS, one of the chiefs of the Ædui, in the age of Cæsar, &c. Cæs. B. G 1, 16.

VERITAS, (Truth,) was not only personified by the ancients, but also made a deity, and called the daughter of Saturn and the mother of Virtue. She was represented like a young virgin, dressed in white apparel, with all the marks of youthful diffidence and modesty. Democritus used to say, that she hid herself at the bottom of a well, to intimate the difficulty with which she is found; and Apelles, in his celebrated picture of Calumny, represented her dressed in a modest manner, and standing at a distance. Pind. Olymp. 10, 5.

VEROMANDUI, a people of Gallia Belgica Secunda, below the Nervii and Atrebates. Their chief town was Augusta Veromanduorum, now St Quentin. Cæs. B. G. 2, 4 —Plin. 4, 17

VERÓNA, a city of Gallia Cisalpina, in the territory of the Cenomanni, and situate on the river Athesis, in an eastern direction from the southern extremity of the Lacus Benacus. The history of its foundation is somewhat uncertain, for Pliny ascribes it to the Rhæti and Euganei, while Livy as positively attributes it to the Cenomanni. It will be easy to reconcile these two opinions, by admitting that the Cenomanni made this settlement in the territory previously possessed by the Rhæti and Euganei. The birth place of Catullus, of Vitruvius, of Cornelius Nepos, of Pliny the naturalist, of Paul Veronese, of Scaliger, of Maffei, of Pindemonte, and other illustrious men of ancient and modern days, it possesses a strong historic interest; while our own Shakspeare has peopled it with imaginary beings, not less palpably defined to the fancy, than the shades of the historic dead. It is thus felt to be at once classic and romantic ground; nor does the tomb of Pepin, nor even the arch of Gallienus, waken a stronger interest than the supposed tomb of Juliet. The wines of Verona were celebrated in ancient times, as appears from Virgil's apostrophe to the produce of the Rhætic grape; but their reputation at present is very low, as is that of almost all the wines produced on the northern side of the Apennines. Plin 3, 19.— Liv. 5, 35.—Ovid. Am. 3, 14.—Martial. 14 193.— Virg G 2, 95.

VERRES, C., a Roman who governed the province of Sicily as pretor. The oppression and rapine of which he was guilty, while in office, so offended the Sicilians, that they brought an accusation against him before the Roman senate. Cicero, who was connected with the unfortunate Sicilians by a former questorship, undertook their cause, and pronounced those celebrated orations which are still extant. Verres was defended by Hortensius, but as he despaired of the success of his defence, he left Rome without waiting for his sentence, and lived in great affluence in one of the provinces. He was at last killed by the soldiers of Antony the triumvir, about 26 years after his voluntary exile from the capital. Cic. in Verr.— Plin. 34, 2.

VERRIUS FLACCUS, a freedman and grammarian, famous for his powers in instructing. He was appointed over the grand-children of Augustus, and also distinguished himself by his writings. A. Gell. 4, 5. — Suet. de Gram.

VERTICORDIA, one of the surnames of Venus, the same as the Apostrophia of the Greeks, because her assistance was implored to turn the hearts of the Roman matrons, and teach them to follow virtue and modesty. Val. Max. 8, 15.

VERTUMNUS, a deity among the Romans, who presided over the spring and over orchards. He endeavoured to gain the affections of the goddess Pomona; and to effect this, he assumed the shape and dress of a fisherman, of a soldier, a peasant, a reaper &c., but all to no purpose, till under the form of an old woman, he prevailed upon his mistress and married her. He is generally represented as a young man crowned with flowers, covered up to the waist, and holding in his right hand fruit, and a crown of plenty in his left. Ovid. Met. 14, 642, &c.—Propert. 4, 2, 2.—Horat Sat. 2, 7, 14.

VERUS, LUCIUS CEIONIUS COMMODUS, a Roman emperor, son of Ælius and Domitia Lucilla. He was adopted in the seventh year of his age by M Aurelius, at the request of Adrian, and he married Lucilla the daughter of his adopted father, who also took him as his colleague on the throne. He was sent by M. Aurelius to oppose the barbarians in the east. His arms were attended with success, and he obtained a victory over the Parthians. He was honoured with a triumph at his return home, and soon after he marched with his imperial colleague against the Marcomanni in Germany. He died in this expedition of an apoplexy, in the 39th year of his age, after a reign of eight years and some months. His body was brought back to Rome, and buried by M. Aurelius with great pomp and solemnity. Verus has been greatly censured for his debaucheries, which appeared more enormous and disgusting when compared to the temperance, meekness, and popularity of Aurelius. The example of his father did not influence him, and he often retired from the frugal and moderate repast of Aurelius, to the profuse banquets of his own palace, where the night was spent in riot and debauchery, with the meanest of the populace, with stage-dancers, buffoons, and lascivious courtesans. At one entertainment alone, where there were no more than twelve guests, the emperor spent no less than six millions of sesterces, or about 32,200l. sterling. But it is to be observed, that what ever was most scarce and costly was there; the guests never drank twice out of the same cup; and whatever vessels they had touched, they received as a present from the emperor when they left the palace. In his Parthian expedition, Verus did not check his vicious propensities; for four years he left the care of the war to his officers, while he retired to the voluptuous retreats of Daphne, and the luxurious banquets of Antioch. His fondness for a horse has been faithfully recorded. The animal had a statue of gold; he was fed with almonds and raisins by the hand of the emperor; he was clad in purple, and kept in the most splendid of the halls of the palace, and when dead, the emperor, to express his sorrow, raised him a magnificent monument on mount Vatican. Some have suspected M. Aurelius of dispatching Verus to rid the world of his debaucheries and guilty actions, but that seems to be the report of malevolence.—L. Annæus, a son of the emperor Aurelius, who died in Palestine.—The father of the emperor Verus. He was adopted by the emperor Adrian, but like his son he disgraced himself by his debaucheries and extravagance. He died before Adrian.

VESPASIANUS, TITUS FLAVIUS, a Roman emperor, descended from an obscure family at Reate. He was honoured with the consulship, not so much by the influence of the imperial courtiers, as by his own private merit, and his public services. He accompanied, Nero into Greece, but he offended the prince by falling asleep while he repeated one of his poetical compositions. This momentary resentment of the emperor did not prevent Vespasian from being sent to carry on a war against the Jews. His operations were crowned with success; many of the cities of Palestine surrendered, and Vespasian began the siege of Jerusalem. This was, however, achieved by the hands of his son Titus, and the death of Vitellius and the affection of his soldiers hastened his rise, and he was proclaimed emperor at Alexandria. The choice of the army was approved by every province of the empire; but Vespasian did not betray any signs of pride at so sudden and so unexpected an exaltation, and though once employed in the mean office of a horse doctor, he behaved, when invested with the imperial purple, with all the dignity and greatness which became a successor of Augustus. In the beginning of his reign Vespasian attempted to reform the manners of the Romans, and he took away an appointment which he had a few days before granted to a young nobleman who approached him to return him thanks, all smelling of perfumes and covered with ointment, adding, I had rather you had smelt of garlick. He repaired the public buildings, embellished the city, and made the great roads more spacious and convenient. After he had reigned with great popularity for ten years, Vespasian died with a pain in his bowels, A. D. 79, in the 70th year of his age. He was the first Roman emperor that died a natural death, and he was also the first who was succeeded by his own son on the throne. Vespasian has been admired for his great virtues. He was clement, he gave no ear to flattery, and for a long time refused the title of father of his country, which was often bestowed upon the most worthless and tyrannical of the emperors. He despised informers, and rather than punish conspirators, he rewarded them with great liberality. When the king of Parthia addressed him with the superscription of Arsaces king of kings to Flavius Vespasianus, the emperor was no way dissatisfied with the pride and insolence of the monarch, and answered him again in his own words, Flavius Vespasianus to Arsaces king of kings. To men of learning and merit, Vespasian was very liberal: one hundred thousand sesterces were annually paid from the public treasury to the various professors that were appointed to encourage and promote the arts and sciences. Yet in spite of this apparent generosity, some authors have taxed him with avarice. According to them he loaded the provinces with new taxes, he bought commodities, that he might sell them to a greater advantage, and even laid an impost upon urine, which gave occasion to Titus to ridicule the meanness of his father. Vespasian, regardless of his son's observation, was satisfied to show him the money that was raised from so productive a tax, asking him at the same time whether it smelt offensive? His ministers were the most avaricious of his subjects, and the emperor used very properly to remark that he treated them as sponges, by wetting them when dry, and squeezing them when they were wet. He has been accused of selling criminals their lives, and of condemning the most opulent to make himself master of their possessions. If, however, he was guilty of these meaner practices, they were all under the name of one of his concubines, who wished to enrich herself by the avarice and credulity of the emperor. Suet. in Vita.—Tacit Hist. 4.

VESTA, a goddess, daughter of Rhea and Saturn, sister to Ceres and Juno. She is often confounded by the mythologists with Rhea, Ceres, Cybele, Proserpine, Hecate, and Tellus. When considered as the mother of the gods, she is the mother of Rhea and Saturn, and when considered as the patroness of the vestal virgins and the goddess of fire, she is called the daughter of Saturn and Rhea. Under this last name she was worshipped by the Romans. Æneas was the first who introduced her mysteries into Italy, and Numa built her a temple where no males were permitted to go. The palladium of Troy was supposed to be preserved within her sanctuary, and a fire was continually kept lighted by a certain number of virgins, who had dedicated themselves to the service of the goddess. [Vid. Vestales.] If the fire

Vesta was ever extinguished, it was supposed to threaten the republic with some sudden calamity. The virgin by whose negligence it had been extinguished, was severely punished, and it was kindled again by the rays of the sun. The temple of Vesta was of a round form, and the goddess was represented in a long flowing robe, with a veil on her head, holding in one hand a lamp, or a two-eared vessel, and in the other a javelin, or sometimes a palladium. On some medals she appears holding a drum in one hand, and a small figure of victory in the other. Hesiod. Theog. 454.—Cic. de Orat. 3, 12.—Apollod. 1, 1.—Virg. Æn. 2, 296.—*Ovid. VESTALES, priestesses among the Romans, consecrated to the service of Vesta, as their name indicates. This office was very ancient, as the mother of Romulus was one of the vestals. Æneas is supposed to have first chosen the vestals. Numa first appointed four, to which number Tarquin added two. They were always chosen by the monarchs, but after the expulsion of the Tarquins, the high priest was entrusted with the care of them. As they were to be virgins, they were chosen young, from the age of six to ten; and if there was not a sufficient number that presented themselves as candidates for the office, twenty virgins were selected, and they upon whom the lot fell were obliged to become priestesses. Plebeians as well as patricians, were permitted to propose themselves, but it was required that they should be born of a good family, and be without blemish or deformity in every part of their body. For thirty years they were to remain in the greatest continence; the ten first years were spent in learning the duties of the order; the ten following were employed in discharging them with fidelity and sanctity; and the ten last in instructing such as had entered the novitiate. When the thirty years were elapsed, they were permitted to marry, or if they still preferred celibacy, they waited upon the rest of the vestals. As soon as a vestal was initiated, her head was shaved, to intimate the liberty of her person, as she was then free from the shackles of parental authority, and she was permitted to dispose of her possessions as she pleased. The employment of the vestals was to take care that the sacred fire of Vesta was not extinguished, for if it ever happened, it was deemed the prognostic of great calamities to the state; the offender was punished for her negligence, and severely scourged by the high priest. In such a case all was consternation at Rome, and the fire was again kindled by glasses with the rays of the sun. Another equally particular charge of the vestals was to keep a sacred pledge, on which depended the very existence of Rome, which according to some, was the palladium of Troy, or some of the mysteries of the gods of Samothrace. The privileges of the vestals were great; they had the most honourable seats at public games and festivals; a lictor with the fasces always preceded them when they walked in public; they were carried in chariots when they pleased; and they had the power of pardoning criminals when led to execution, if they declared that their meeting was accidental. Their declarations in trials were received without the formality of an oath; they were chosen as arbiters in causes of moment, and in the execution of wills, and so great was the deference paid them by the magistrates, as well as by the people, that the consuls themselves made way for them, and bowed their faces when they passed before them. To insult them was a capital crime, and whoever attempted to violate their chastity, was beaten to death with scourges. If any of them died while in office, their body was buried within the walls of the city, an honour granted to few. Such of the vestals as proved incontinent, were punished in the most rigorous manner. Numa ordered them to be sconced, but Tarquin the elder dug a large hole under the earth, where a bed was placed, with a little bread, wine, water, and oil, and a lighted lamp, and the guilty vestal was stripped of the habit of her order, and compelled to descend into the subterranean cavity, which was immediately shut, and she was left to die through hunger. Few of the vestals were guilty of incontinence, and for the space of one thousand years, during which the order continued established from the reign of Numa, only eighteen were punished for the violation of their vow. The vestals were abolished by Theodosius the Great, and the fire of Vesta extinguished. The dress of the vestals was peculiar; they wore a white vest with purple borders, a white linen surplice called linteum supernum, above which was a great purple mantle which flowed to the ground, and which was tucked up when they offered sacrifices. They had a close covering on their head, called mitra, from which hung fillets, or vittæ. Their manner of living was sumptuous, as they were maintained at the public expense, and though originally satisfied with the simple diet of the Romans, their table soon after displayed the luxuries and the superfluities of the great and opulent. Plut. in Num. &c.—Val Max. 1, 1.—Cic. de Nat. D. 3, 80.

VESTALIA, festivals in honour of Vesta, observed at Rome on the 9th of June. Banquets were then prepared before the houses, and meat was sent to the vestals to be offered to the gods; millstones were decked with garlands, and the asses that turned them were led round the city covered with garlands. The ladies walked in the procession bare-footed to the temple of the goddess, and an altar was erected to Jupiter surnamed Pistor. Ovid. Fast. 6, 305.

VESTALIUM MATER, a title given by the senate to Livia the mother of Tiberius, with the permission to sit among the vestal virgins at plays. Tacit. Ann. 4, 16.

VESTINI, a mountaineer race of Italy, whose territory was bounded on the south and south-west by the Peligni and Marsi, on the east by the Adriatic, and on the north and north-west by the Prætutii and Sabines. Their chief town was Pinna, now Civita di Penna. Strab. 5.

VESUVIUS. Vid. Vesuvius.

VEXOLUS, now Monte Viso, a mountain at the termination of the Maritime, and commencement of the Cottian, Alps. It is celebrated in antiquity as giving rise to the Padus, or Po. Pliny mentions the source as being a remarkable sight.—Plin. 3, 16.

VESUVIUS, a mountain of Campania, about eight miles south-east of Naples, celebrated for its volcano. It rises with a gentle acclivity from the bay of Naples to the height of 3620 feet above the level of the sea. It appears to have been first known under the name of Vesu-vus, but the appellations of Vesvius and Vesbius are no less frequently applied to it. The upper part of the mountain has been torn by a series of convulsions, and is strewed with its own fragments; the part next to the descent is mixed with dried lava, extending in wide black lines over its surface; whilst the lower part of the volcano, as if danger were far remote, is covered with villages and country seats, with groves of fruit trees, vineyards, and other luxuriant productions, all displaying the great fertility given by the ashes to the soil. The summit of the mountain is in the form of a cone, and consists of masses of burnt earth, ashes and sand, thrown out in the course of ages by the volcano: the crater is nearly a mile and a half in circumference; but its depth, or descent from the ridge, is not above 350 feet. The total number of great eruptions on record is above thirty, reckoning from the celebrated one of A. D. 79. which proved destructive to Pompeii, Herculaneum, and Stabiæ: one of the latest, though not most formidable, took place in 1819, and has somewhat lowered the height of the mountain. Dio Cass. 66.—Varro de R.R. 1, 6.—Liv. 23, 39.—Strab. 5.—*Tacit. VETERA CASTRA, a Roman encampment in Germany, which became a town, now Xanten, near Cleves. Tacit. H. 4, 18. Ann. 1, 45.

VETTIUS, SP. a Roman senator, who was made interrex at the death of Romulus, till the election of another king. He nominated Numa, and resigned his office.—Plut. in Num.——A Roman knight who became enamoured of a young female at Capua, and raised a tumult amongst the slaves who proclaimed him king. He was betrayed by one of his adherents, upon which he laid violent hands upon himself.

VETTONES, a nation of Lusitania, lying along the western boundary. Plin. 4, 20.—Sil. Ital. 3, 378.

VETULONII, one of the most powerful and distinguished of the twelve cities of Etruria, a few miles to the south-west of Veterna. Its remains exist in a forest still called Selva di Vetlonia. The Romans are said to have derived the insignia of their magisterial offices from Vetulonii. Plin. 3. 5.—Sil. Ital. 8, 485.

VETURIA, one of the Roman tribes, divided into two branches of the Junii and Æmili. It received its name from the Veturian family, which was originally called Vetusian.—Liv. 36——The mother of Coriolanus. She was solicited by all the Roman matrons to go to her son with her daughter-in-law, and entreat him not to make war against his country. She went and prevailed over Coriolanus, and for her services to the state, the Roman senate offered to reward her as she pleased. She only asked to raise a temple to the goddess of female fortune, which was done on the very spot where she had pacified her son. Liv. 2, 40.—Dionys. Hal. 7, &c.

VETURIUS, a Roman artist, who made shields for Rome.—Vid. Mamurius.

UFENS, now Ufente, a river of Latium, rising in the Volscian mountains, above Setia and Privernum, and, in consequence of the want of a sufficient fall in the Pontine plains, through which it passed, contributing with other streams to form the Pontine marshes. Virg. Æn. 7, 802.—Sil. Ital. 8, 394.——A prince who assisted Turnus against Æneas. The Trojan monarch made a vow to sacrifice his four sons to appease the manes of his friend Pallas, in the same manner as Achilles is represented killing some Trojan youths on the tomb of Patroclus. Virg. Æn. 7, 745. 10, 518. He was afterwards killed by Gyas.—Id. 12, 460.

UFENTINA, a Roman tribe, first created A.U.C. 435, with the tribe Falerna, in consequence of the great increase of population at Rome. Liv 9, 20.

VIA, ÆMILIA, a celebrated road, made by the consul M. Æmilius Lepidus, A. U. C. 567. It led with the Flaminian road to Aquileia. There was also another of the same name in Etruria, which led from Pisa to Dertona.——Appia called by way of eminence Regina Viarum, was made by the censor Appius Cæcus, A.U.C. 441, and originally carried only as far as Capua, passing through Aricia, Tarracina, and Sinuessa. From Capua it was afterwards continued to Beneventum, and finally to Brundusium: at Beneventum it divided into two branches, one of which passed through Venusia and Tarentum to Brundusium, the other led through Equus Tuticus, Canusium, and Egnatia, which city communicated to the latter road the name of Via Egnatia.——There was also another road called Minucia, or Numicia, which led to Brundusium, but by what places is now uncertain.——Flaminia was constructed by C. Flaminius the censor, A.U.C. 533, and extended originally only as far as Narnia; here it divided, one branch passing through Carsula, the other through Spoletium, and both joined at Fulginia. Hence it continued to Nuceria, where it separated again; one road passing through Septempeda, Ancona, and along the coast of the Hadriatic as far as Fanum Fortunæ, where it was rejoined by the other branch, which had passed through Helvillum and the Petra Pertusa: from Fanum Fortunæ, the Via Flaminia passed on to Ariminum.——Late one of the ancient streets of Rome.——Valeria supposed to have been constructed by the censor M. Valerius Maximus, commenced at Tibur, and passed through Corfinium and Teate Marrucinorum to Hadra in Picenum. There were besides many streets and roads of inferior note, such as the Aurelia, Cassia, Campania, Ardeatina, Labicana, Domitiana, Ostiensis, Prænestina, &c. all of which were made and constantly kept in repair at the public expense.

VIADRUS, or VIADUA, a river of Germany, generally regarded as answering to the modern Oder.

VIBIUS, a Roman who refused to pay any attention to Cicero when banished, though he had received from him the most unbounded favours.——Virius, a man at Capua who advised his countrymen to revolt to Annibal. When Capua was retaken by the Romans, he poisoned himself not to fall into the hands of the conquerors. Liv. 26. 13 et 14.——Sequester, a Latin writer, who wrote a geographical catalogue of the rivers, lakes, mountains, forests, &c. for his son Virgilianus, from which many illustrations of other authors, particularly the poets, may be derived. He is supposed to have flourished between the fifth and the seventh centuries. The best edition of Vibius Sequester is that of Oberlinus, 8vo. Argent. 1778.

VIBO, Valentia. Vid. Hipponium.

VICA POTA, a goddess at Rome, who presided over victory (victoria and potior). Liv. 2, 7.

VICENTIA, or VICETIA, a town of Gallia Cisalpina, in the territory of Venetia, and situate between Patavium and Verona. It is now Vicenza. Strab 5.— Tacit. Hist 3, 6.

VICTOR, SEXT. AURELIUS, a Latin historian, who lived in the fourth century. He was the son of humble parents, and did not enjoy the benefit of a learned education. The place of his birth is not recorded, but however obscure his origin, he possessed talents which procured him the highest honours In the year 361, the emperor Julian appointed him prefect of Pannonia, and a long time afterwards he was prefect of Rome, and in the year 369, consul with Valentinian. He appears to have lived till towards the end of the fourth century. The following works are extant under his name, "Origo gentis Romanæ;" "De Viris illustribus Romæ," "De Cæsaribus, sive historiæ abbreviatæ pars altera, ab Augusto Octaviano, ad est. a fine Titi Livii usque ad consulatum decimum Constantii Augusti et Juliani Cæsaris tertium" The best editions of Aurelius Victor are, that of Pitiscus, 8vo. Traj. Rh. 1696; and that of Arntzenius, 4to Amst. 1733 —— Surnamed, for distinction sake, the Younger, a contemporary of Orosius, who made an abridgment of one of the works of the elder Victor (the third above mentioned) which he entitled "Epitome de Cæsaribus," or, according to others, "De Vita et Moribus Imperatorum Romanorum," and which he continued down to the death of Theodosius the Great. He made some changes also in the original work, and added some new facts and circumstances.

VICTORIA, one of the deities of the Romans, called by the Greeks Nike, supposed to be the daughter of the giant Pallas, or of Titan and Styx. The goddess of Victory was sister of Strength and Valour and was one of the attendants of Jupiter. She was greatly honoured by the Greeks, particularly at Athens. Sylla raised her temple at Rome, and instituted festivals in her honour. She was represented with wings, crowned with laurel, and holding the branch of a palm tree in her hand A golden statue of this goddess, weighing 320 pounds, was presented to the Romans by Hiero, king of Syracuse, and deposited in the temple of Jupiter on the Capitoline hill. Liv. 31.— Varro de L. L. 4, 10.— Hesiod. Theog. 384.— Hygin. præf. fab. — Suet. in Aug 100

VICTORINA, a celebrated matron who placed herself at the head of the Roman armies, and made war against the emperor Gallienus. Her son Victorinus, and her grandson of the same name were declared emperors but when they were assassinated, Victorina invested with the imperial purple one of her favourites called Tetricus. She was some time after poisoned, A.D. 269, and, according to some, by Tetricus himself.

VICTORINUS, an African philosopher, converted to Christianity, flourished in the fourth century. He taught rhetoric in Rome for many years, with so much reputation, that a statue to his honour was erected in one of the public places. The study of Plato's works is said to have given him the first impression in favour of the scriptures, and to have led him to the perusal of them, by which he was convinced of their truth. Victorinus was the author of several works of no great value contained in the Bibliotheca Patrum.

VICUS LONGUS, a street at Rome, where an altar was raised to the goddess Pudicitia, or the Modesty of the plebeians. Liv. 10. 23.— Cyprius, a place on the Esquiline hill, where the Sabines dwelt.

VIDUCASSES, a people of Gallia Lugdunensis Secunda, on both sides of the river Oliris, or Orne. Plin. 4, 18.

VIENNA, a city of the Allobroges, in Gallia Transalpina, famed for its wealth and the civilisation of its inhabitants. At a later period it became the metropolis of the provinces of Viennensis, and in the fifth century the residence of the Burgundian kings. It is now Vienne. Cæs. B. G. 7, 9.— Tacit. Ann. 11, 1.— Mela, 2, 5.— Plin. 3, 4.

VILLIA LEX, annalis or annaria, by L. Villius, the tribune, A. U. C. 574, defined the proper age required for exercising the office of a magistrate, twenty-five years for the quæstorship, twenty-seven or twenty-eight for the ædileship, or tribuneship, for the office of prætor thirty, and for that of consul forty-three. Liv. 11, 44.

VILLIUS, a tribune of the people, author of the Villian law, and thence called Annalis, a surname borne by his family. Liv. 11, 44.—— Publius, a Roman ambassador sent to Antiochus. He held a conference with Annibal, who was at that monarch's court.——A man who disgraced himself by his criminal amours with the daughter of Sylla. Horat. Sat 1, 2, 64.

VIMINALIS, one of the seven hills on which Rome was built, so called from the number of osiers (viminea) which grew there. Servius Tullius first made it part of the city. Jupiter had a temple there, whence he was called Viminalis. Liv. 1, 44.— Varro, L. L. 4, 8.

VINALIA, festivals at Rome in honour of Jupiter and Venus.

VINDELICI, an ancient people of Germany, between the heads of the Rhine and the Danube. Their country, which was called Vindelicia, forms now part of Swabia and Bavaria. and their chief town Augusta Vindelicorum, is now Augsburg. The Vindelici are said by some to have been Illyrians, whose name was derived from the two rivers Vindo, or Wertach, and Licus, or Lech, which ran through their territory; others say they were a branch of the Venedi, who, settling on the Licus, thus received their name. Horat Od. 4 4, 18.

VINDEMIATOR, a constellation that rose about the nones of March. Ovid. Fast. 3, 407. — Plin. 18, 13.

VINDEX JULIUS, a governor of Gaul, who revolted against Nero, and determined to deliver the Roman empire from his tyranny. He was followed by a numerous army, but at last defeated by one of the emperor's generals. When he perceived that all was lost, he laid violent hands upon himself, 68 A.D. Suet. in Galb.— Tacit. Hist. 1, 51.— Plin. ep. 9, 19.

VINDICIUS, a slave who discovered the conspiracy which some of the most noble of the Roman citizens had formed to restore Tarquin to his throne. He was amply rewarded, and made a citizen of Rome. Liv. 2, 5.— Plut. in Popl.

VINDONISSA, now Windisch, a town of the Helvetii on the Aar, in the territory of Basle. Tacit. Hist. 4, 61 et 70.

VINIUS, T., a commander in the prætorian guards, intimate with Galba, of whom he became the first minister. He was honoured with the consulship, and some time after, in consequence of his profligacy and many crimes, he was murdered. Tacit. Hist. 1, 11. 42 et 48.—Plut.

VIPSANIA, a daughter of M. Agrippa, mother of Drusus. She was the only one of Agrippa's daughters who died a natural death. She was married to Tiberius when a private man, and when she had been repudiated, she married Asinius Gallus. Tacit. Ann. 1, 12. 3, 19.

VIRAGO, a name applied to Minerva and Diana, as expressive of the boldness, the fortitude and manly exertions of their character. Ovid. Met. 2, 765 6, 130.—Stat. Silv. 4, 5, 23.——It is also applied to Medusa and to Jupiter. Stat. Theb. 11, 414.—Virg. Æn. 12, 468.

VIRBIUS, (qui inter vivos bis fuit,) a name given to Hippolytus, after he had been brought back to life by Æsculapius, at the instance of Diana, who pitied his unfortunate end. Some suppose that Æsculapius was destroyed by Jupiter for raising him to life, and that he was concealed in a forest in Italy by Diana, under the name of Virbius. Here he married Aricia, and had a son called also Virbius, who supported Turnus against Æneas. Ovid. Met. 15, 544.—Hygin. fab. 251.

VIRGILIUS MARO, PUBLIUS, called the prince of the Latin poets, was born at Andes, a village near Mantua, about 70 years before Christ, on the 15th of October. His first years were spent at Cremona, where his taste was formed, and his rising talents first exercised. The distribution of the lands of Cremona to the soldiers of Augustus, after the battle of Philippi, nearly proved fatal to the poet, and when he attempted to dispute the possession of his fields with a soldier, Virgil was obliged to save his life from the resentment of the lawless veteran, by swimming across a river. This was the beginning of his greatness; he with his father repaired to Rome, where he soon formed an acquaintance with Mecænas, and recommended himself to the favours of Augustus. The emperor restored his lands to the poet, whose modest muse knew so well how to pay the tribute of gratitude, and his first bucolic was written to thank his patron, as well as to tell the world that his favours were not unworthily bestowed. The ten bucolics were written in about three years. The poet showed his countrymen that he could write with graceful simplicity, with elegance, delicacy of sentiments, and with purity of language. Some time after, Virgil undertook the Georgics, a poem the most perfect and finished of all Latin compositions. The Æneid [Vid. Æneis] was begun, as some suppose, at the particular request of Augustus, and the poet, while he attempted to prove that the Julian family was lineally descended from the founder of Lavinium, visibly described in the pious and benevolent character of his hero, the amiable qualities of his imperial patron. The great merit of this poem is well known, and it will ever remain undecided, which of the two poets, either Homer or Virgil, is more entitled to our praise, our applause, and our admiration. The writer of the Iliad stood as a pattern to the favourite of Augustus. The voyage of Æneas is copied from the Odyssey; and for his battles, Virgil found a model in the wars of Troy, and the animated descriptions of the Iliad. The poet died before he had revised this immortal work, which had already engaged his time for eleven successive years. He had attempted to attend his patron in the east, but he was detained at Naples on account of his ill health. He, however, went to Athens, where he met Augustus on his return, but he soon after fell sick at Megara, and though indisposed, he ordered himself to be removed to Italy. He landed at Brundusium, where a few days after he expired, the 22d of September, in the 51st year of his age, B C 19. He left the greatest part of his immense possessions to his friends, particularly to Mecænas, Tucca, and Augustus, and he ordered, as his last will, his unfinished poem to be burnt. These last injunctions were disobeyed; and, according to the words of an ancient poet, Augustus saved his favourite Troy from a second and more dismal conflagration. The poem was delivered by the emperor to three of his literary friends. They were ordered to revise and expunge whatever they deemed improper; but they were strictly enjoined not to make any additions, and hence, as some suppose, the causes that so many lines of the Æneid are unfinished, particularly in the last books. The body of the poet, according to his own directions, was conveyed to Naples, and interred with much solemnity in a monument, erected on the road that leads from Naples to Puteoli. [Vid. Faustilipus.] The following modest distich was engraved on the tomb, written by the poet some few moments before he expired:

Parthenope: cecini pascua, rura, duces.

The Romans were not insensible of the merit of their poet. Virgil received much applause in the capital, and when he entered the theatre, he was astonished and delighted to see the crowded audience rise up to him as to an emperor, and welcome his approach by reiterated plaudits. He was naturally modest, and of a timorous disposition. When people crowded to gaze upon him, or pointed at him with the finger with rapture, the poet blushed, and stole away from them, and often hid himself in shops to be removed from the curiosity and admiration of the public. The most liberal and gratifying marks of approbation he received, were from the emperor and from Octavia. He attempted in his Æneid to paint the virtues, and to lament the premature death of the son of Octavia, and he was desired by the emperor to repeat the lines in the presence of the afflicted mother. He had no sooner begun O nate, &c., than Octavia burst into tears; he continued, but he had artfully suppressed the name of her son; and when he repeated in the 16th line the well known words, Tu Marcellus eris, the princess swooned away, and the poet withdrew, but not without being liberally rewarded. Octavia presented him ten sesterces for every one of his verses in praise of her son, the whole of which was equivalent to two thousand pounds English money. As an instance of his modesty, the following circumstance has been recorded. Virgil wrote this distich, in which he compared his patron to Jupiter,

Nocte pluit tota, redeunt spectacula mane.
Divisum imperium cum Jove Cæsar habet, and placed it in the night on the gates of the palace of Augustus. Inquiries were made for the author by order of Augustus, and when Virgil had the difficulties not to declare himself, Bathyllus, a contemptible poet of the age, claimed the verses as his own, and was liberally rewarded. This displeased Virgil; he again wrote the verses near the palace, and under them with the beginning of another line in these words,

Sic vos non vobis,

four times repeated. Augustus wished the lines to be finished, Bathyllus seemed unable, and Virgil at last by completing the stanza in the following order:—

Sic vos non vobis nidificatis aves;
Sic vos non vobis vellera fertis oves;
Sic vos non vobis mellificatis apes;
Sic vos non vobis fertis aratra boves;

proved himself to be the author of the distich, and the poetical usurper became the sport and ridicule of Rome. In the works of Virgil we can find a more perfect and satisfactory account of the religious ceremonies and customs of the Romans, than in all the other Latin poets, Ovid excepted. Every thing he mentions is founded upon historical truth, and though he borrowed much from his predecessors, and even whole lines from Ennius, yet he has had the happiness to make all his own. He was uncommonly severe in revising his own poetry, and he used often to compare him-self to a bear that licks her cubs into shape. In his connections, Virgil was remarkable, his friendship enjoyed his unbounded confidence, and his library and possessions seemed to be the property of the public. Like other great men he was not without his enemies and detractors in his life-time, but from their aspersions he received additional lustre. The best edition of Virgil is that of Heyne, which first appeared from the Leipsic press, in 1767-69, 4 vols. 8vo. It was often reprinted: the last and most complete edition is the Leipsic one of 1800, 4 vols. 8vo. Of the translators of Virgil the most popular are Dryden, Pitt, and Warton. Peterc. 2, 36.—Horat. Sat. 1, 5, 40.—Propert. 2, 34, 61.—Ovid. Fratr. 1, 2.

VIRGINIA, a daughter of the centurion L. Virginius. Appius Claudius the decemvir, became enamoured of her, and attempted to remove her from the place where she resided. She was claimed by one of his favourites as the daughter of a slave, and Appius, in the capacity, and with the authority of judge, had pronounced the sentence, and delivered her into the hands of his friend, when Virginius, informed of his violent proceedings, arrived from the camp. The father demanded to see his daughter, and when his request was granted, he snatched a knife and plunged it into Virginia's breast, exclaiming, This is all, my dearest daughter, I can give thee, to preserve thy chastity from the lust and violence of a tyrant. No sooner was the blow given, than Virginius ran to the camp with the bloody knife in his hand. The soldiers were astonished and incensed, not against the murderer, but the tyrant that was the cause of Virginia's death, and they immediately marched to Rome. Appius was seized, but he destroyed himself in prison, and prevented the execution of the law. Spurius Oppius, another of the decemvirs who had not opposed the tyrant's views, killed himself also, and Marcus Claudius, the favourite of Appius, was put to death, and the decemviral power abolished, about 449 years before Christ. Liv. 3, 44, &c.—Juv. 10, 294.

VIRGINIUS, the father of Virginia, made tribune of the people. [Vid. Virginia.]——A tribune of the commons, who accused Q. Cæso, the son of Cincinnatus. He increased the number of the tribunes to ten, and distinguished himself by his seditions against the patricians.——Caius, a prætor of Sicily, who opposed the entrance of Cicero into his province, though under many obligations to the orator. Some read Virgilius.

VIRIATHUS, a mean shepherd of Lusitania, who gradually rose to power, and by first heading a gang of robbers, saw himself at last followed by a numerous army. He made war against the Romans with uncommon success, and for 14 years enjoyed the envied title of protector of public liberty in the provinces of Spain. Many generals were defeated, and Pompey himself was ashamed to find himself beaten. Cæpio was at last sent against him. But his despair of conquering him by force of arms, obliged him to have recourse to artifice, and, he had the meanness to bribe the servants of Viriathus to murder their master, B.C. 140. Flor. 2, 17.—Val. Max. 6, 4.—Liv 52 et 54.

VIRIDOVARUS, a young man of great power among the Ædui. Cæsar greatly honoured him, but he fought at last against the Romans, and was killed in single combat by Marcellus. Cæs. Bell. G. 7, 39, &c.

VIRIPLACA, a goddess among the Romans who presided over the peace of families, whence her name [virum placere]. If any quarrel happened between a man and his wife, they generally repaired to the temple of the goddess, which was erected on the Palatine mount, and came back reconciled. Val. Max. 2. 1.

VIRTUS. All virtues were made deities among the Romans. Marcellus erected two temples, one to Virtue, and the other to Honour. They were built in such a manner, that to see the temple of Honour it was necessary to pass through that of Virtue; a happy allegory among a nation free and independent. The principal Virtues were distinguished, each by their attire. Prudence was knowneby her rule, and her pointing to a globe at her feet; Temperance had a bridle; Justice held an equal balance; and Fortitude leant against her sword; Honesty was clad in a transparent vest; Modesty appeared veiled; Clemency wore an olive branch, and Devotion threw incense upon an altar; Tranquillity was seen to lean on a column; Health was known by her serpent, Liberty by her cap, and Gaiety by her myrtle. Cic. de N. D. 2, 23. Plaut. in Amph. Prol.—Liv. 29, 11.—Val. Max. 1, 1.—Aug. de Civ. D. 4, 23.

VISELLIA LEX, was made by Visellius Varro, the consul, A. U.C. 776, to restrain the introduction of improper persons into the offices of the state.

VISTULA, a river falling into the Baltic, the eastern boundary of ancient Germany, now the Vistula or, as the Germans write the word, the Weichsel. Mela, 3, 4.—Plin. 4, 12.—Amm Marc. 22, 8.

VISURGIS, a river of Germany, now called the Weser, and falling into the German ocean. Vell Pat. 2, 105. —Tacit. Ann. 1, 70.

VITELLIUS AULUS, a Roman raised by his vices to the throne. He was descended from one of the most illustrious families of Rome, and as such he gained an easy admission to the palace of the emperors. The greatest part of his youth was spent at Capreæ, where his willingness and compliance to gratify the most vicious propensities of Tiberius raised his father to the dignity of consul and governor of Syria The applause he gained in this school of debauchery, was too great and flattering to induce Vitellius to alter his conduct, and no longer to be one of the votaries of vice. Caligula was pleased with his skill in driving a chariot. Claudius loved him because he was a great gamester, and he recommended himself to the favours of Nero by wishing him to sing publicly in the crowded theatre. With such an insinuating disposition, it is not to be wondered that Vitellius became so great. He did not fail with his patrons, like the other favourites, but the death of an emperor seemed to raise him to greater honours, and to procure him fresh applause. He passed through all the offices of the state, and gained over the soldiery by donations and liberal promises. He was at the head of the Roman legions in Germany when Otho was proclaimed emperor, and the exaltation of his rival was no sooner heard in the camp, than he was likewise invested with the purple by his soldiers. He accepted with pleasure the dangerous office, and instantly marched against Otho. Three battles were fought, and in all Vitellius was conquered. A fourth, however, in the plains between Mantua and Cremona, left him master of the field and of the Roman empire. He feasted his eyes in viewing the bodies of the slain, and the ground covered with blood, and regardless of the insalubrity of the air, proceeding from so many carcases, he told his attendants that the smell of a dead enemy was always sweet. His first care was not like that of a true conqueror, to alleviate the distresses of the conquered, or patronise the friends of the dead, but it was to insult their misfortunes, and to intoxicate himself with the companions of his debauchery in the field of battle. Each successive day exhibited a scene of greater extravagance. Vitellius feasted four or five times a-day, and such was his excess that he often made himself vomit to begin his repast afresh, and to gratify his palate with more luxury. His food was of the most rare and exquisite nature, the deserts of Libya, the shores of Spain, and the waters of the Carpathian sea, were diligently searched to supply the table of the emperor. The most celebrated of his feasts, was that with which he was treated by his brother Lucius. The table, among other meats, was covered with two thousand different dishes of fish, and seven thousand of fowls, and so expensive was he in every thing, that above seven millions sterling were spent in maintaining his table in the space of four months, and Josephus has properly observed that if Vitellius had reigned long, the great opulence of all the Roman empire would have been found insufficient to defray the expenses of his banquets. This extravagance, which delighted the favourites, soon raised the indignation of the people. Vespasian was proclaimed emperor by the army, and his minister Primus was sent to destroy the imperial glutton. Vitellius concealed himself under the bed of the porter of his palace, but this obscure retreat betrayed him, he was dragged naked through the streets, his hands were tied behind his back, and a drawn sword was placed under his chin to make him lift up his head. After suffering the greatest insults from the populace, he was at last carried to the place of execution, and put to death with repeated blows. His head was cut off and fixed to a pole, and his mutilated body dragged with a hook and thrown into the Tiber, A. D. 69, after a reign of about eight months. Suet.—Tacit. Hist. 2.—Eutrop.—Dio.—Plut.——Lucius, the father of the emperor, obtained great honours by his flattery to the emperors. He was made governor of Syria, and in this distant province he obliged the Parthians to sue for peace. His adulation to Messalina is well known, and he obtained as a particular favour the honourable office of pulling off the shoes of the empress, &c. Suet. &c.——A brother of the emperor, who enjoyed his favours by encouraging his gluttony, &c.——Publius, an uncle of the emperor of that name. He was accused under Nero of attempts to bribe the people with money from the treasury against the emperor. He killed himself before his trial.——A son of the emperor Vitellius, put to death by one of his father's friends. ——Some of the family of the Vitellii conspired with the Aquilii and other illustrious Romans to restore Tarquin to his throne. Their conspiracy was discovered by the consuls, and they were severely punished. Plut. &c.

VITRUVIUS POLLIO, M., a celebrated writer on architecture, was born at Verona. He lived in the first part of the first century, performed military service at first under Cæsar, and was appointed by Augustus over the military preparations and public edifices. Rome was improved in beauty by the plan of building projected by him. His work on Architecture consists of ten books, and has been preserved complete even to the sketches belonging to it. Properly speaking only the first seven books treat of architecture, the eighth on aqueducts, the ninth on dials, and the tenth on mechanics. He has often been censured for want of elegance in style, without adverting sufficiently to the novelty and the nature of his materials. The text also needs much correction. The best edition of Vitruvius is that of Schneider, 3 vols. 8vo. Lips. 1807. There is a good French translation by C. Perrault, fol. Paris, 1684; and an English one by W. Wilkins, 2 vols. fol. 1813.

VITULA, a deity among the Romans who presided over festivals and rejoicings. Macrob. 3, 2

ULPIA TRAJANA, a city of Dacia, the residence of Decebalus It was taken by Trajan, and called by his name. Its previous appellation appears to have been Sarmisegethusa. The modern name is Varkely.

ULPIANUM, a town of upper Mœsia, said by Procopius to have been repaired and embellished by Justinian and called Justiniana Secunda. It is now Guistendil.——One of the principal towns of Dacia.

ULPIANUS DOMITIUS, an eminent lawyer, the tutor, friend, and minister of Alexander Severus. When Alexander became emperor, one of his first acts was to recal Ulpian, who had been exiled by Heliogabalus, and to place him at the head of the council of state. He was also made secretary of state, and ultimately prætori an prefect. He lived in great repute for his wise and virtuous administration, until the emperor, probably at his suggestion, undertook the dangerous task of reforming the army. The discontent of the soldiery broke out into a mutiny, and Ulpian, pursued by a body of them, was massacred in the presence of the emperor and his mother, A D. 228. Ulpian has obtained the praise of all the heathens, but the Christians accuse him of a determined enmity to their sect, which he carried so far as to collect all the edicts and decrees of the preceding sovereigns against them. There are remaining of Ulpian, twenty-nine titles of fragments, which are inserted in some editions of the civil law.

ULUBRÆ, a small town of Latium, at no great distance from Velitræ. Its marshy situation is plainly alluded to by Cicero, who calls the inhabitants little frogs. Cic. Ep. ad Fam. 7, 18.—Horat. Epist. 1, 11.—Juv. Sat 10, 102.

ULYSSES, a king of the islands of Ithaca and Dulichium, son of Anticlea and Laertes, or according to some, of Sisyphus [Vid. Sisyphus and Anticlea.] He became like the other princes of Greece, one of the suitors of Helen, but as he despaired of success in his applications, on account of the great number of his competitors, he solicited the hand of Penelope, the daughter of Icarius. Tyndarus, the father of Helen, favoured the addresses of Ulysses, as by him he was directed to choose one of his daughter's suitors without offending the others, and to bind all by a solemn oath, that they would unite together in protecting Helen if any violence was ever offered to her person. Ulysses had no sooner obtained the hand of Penelope, than he returned to Ithaca, where his father resigned him the crown, and retired to peace and rural solitude. The rape of Helen, however, by Paris, did not long permit him to remain in his kingdom, and as he was bound to defend her against every intruder, he was summoned to the war with the other princes of Greece. Pretending to be insane, not to leave his beloved Penelope, he yoked a horse and a bull together, and ploughed the sea shore, where he sowed salt instead of corn. This dissimulation was soon discovered, and Palamedes, by placing before the plough of Ulysses, his infant son Telemachus, convinced the world that the father was not mad, who had the providence to turn away the plough from the furrow, not to hurt his child. Ulysses was therefore obliged to go to the war, but he did not forget him who had discovered his pretended insanity. [Vid. Palamedes.] During the Trojan war, the king of Ithaca was courted for his superior judgment and sagacity. By his means Achilles was discovered among the daughters of Lycomedes, king of Scyros, [Vid. Achilles,] and Philoctetes was induced to abandon Lemnos, and to fight the Trojans with the arrows of Hercules. [Vid. Philoctetes.] He was not less distinguished for his activity and valour. With the assistance of Diomedes he murdered Rhesus, and slaughtered the sleeping Thracians in the midst of their camp, [Vid. Rhesus and Dolon,] and he introduced himself into the city of Troy, and carried away the Palladium of the Trojans [Vid. Palladium.] For these eminent services he was universally applauded by the Greeks, and he was rewarded with the arms of Achilles, which Ajax had disputed with him. After the Trojan war Ulysses embarked on board his ships, to return to Greece, but he was exposed to a number of misfortunes before he reached his native country. He was thrown by the winds upon the coasts of Africa, and visited the country of the Lotophagi, and of the Cyclops in Sicily. Polyphemus, who was king of the Cyclops, seized Ulysses with his companions, five of whom he devoured, [Vid. Polyphemus,] but the prince of Ithaca intoxicated him and put out his eye, and at last escaped from the dangerous cave where he was confined, by tying himself under the belly of the sheep of the Cyclops when led to pasture. In Æolia he met with a friendly reception, and Æolus gave him, confined in bags, all the winds which could obstruct his return to Ithaca, but the curiosity of his companions to know what the bags contained, proved nearly fatal. The winds rushed with impetuosity, and all the fleet was destroyed, except the ship which carried Ulysses. From thence he was thrown upon the coasts of the Læstrygones, and of the island Æea, where the magician Circe changed all his companions into pigs for their voluptuousness. He escaped their fate by means of an herb which he received from Mercury, and after he had obliged the magician by force of arms to restore his companions to their original shape, he yielded to her charms, and made her mother of Telegonus. He visited the infernal regions and consulted Tiresias how to regain his country in safety; and after he had received every necessary information, he returned on earth. He passed along the coasts of the Sirens unhurt, by the directions of Circe, [Vid. Sirenes,] and escaped the whirlpools and shoals of Scylla and Carybdis. On the coasts of Sicily his companions stole and killed some oxen that were sacred to Apollo, for which the god destroyed the ships, and all were drowned, except Ulysses, who saved himself on a plank, and swam to the island of Calypso, in Ogygia. There, for seven years, he forgot Ithaca, in the arms of the goddess by whom he had two children. The gods at last interfered, and Calypso, by order of Mercury, suffered him to depart after she had furnished him with a ship, and every thing requisite for the voyage. He had almost reached the island of Corcyra, when Neptune, still mindful that his son Polyphemus had been robbed of his sight by the perfidy of Ulysses, raised a storm and sunk his ship. Ulysses swam with difficulty to the island of the Phæacians, where the kindness of Nausicaa, and the humanity of her father, king Alcinous, entertained him for a while. He related the series of his misfortunes to the monarch, and at last, by his benevolence, he was conducted in a ship to Ithaca. The Phæacians laid him on the sea shore as he was asleep, and Ulysses found himself safely restored to his country after a long absence of twenty years. He was well informed that his palace was besieged by a number of suitors, who continually disturbed the peace of Penelope, and therefore he assumed the habit of a beggar, by the advice of Minerva, and made himself known to his son, and his faithful shepherd Eumæus. With them he took measures to re establish himself on his throne; he went to the palace, and was personally convinced of the virtues and of the fidelity of Penelope. Before his arrival was publicly known, all the importuning suitors were put to death, and Ulysses restored to the peace and bosom of his family. [Vid. Laertes, Penelope, Telemachus, Eumæus.] He lived about sixteen years after his return, and was at last killed by his son Telegonus, who had landed in Ithaca, with the hopes of making himself known to his father. This unfortunate event had been foretold to him by Tiresias, who assured him that he should die by the violence of something that was to issue from the bosom of the sea. [Vid. Telegonus.] According to some authors, Ulysses went to consult the oracle of Apollo after his return to Ithaca, and he had the meanness to seduce Erippe, the daughter of a king of Epirus who had treated him with great kindness. Erippe had a son by him whom she called Euryalus. When come to years of puberty, Euryalus was sent to Ithaca by his mother, but Penelope no sooner knew who he was than she resolved to destroy him. Therefore when Ulysses returned, he put to immediate death his unknown son, on the crimination of Penelope his wife, who accused him of attempts upon her virtue. The adventures of Ulysses in his return to Ithaca from the Trojan war, are the subject of Homer's Odyssey. Homer. Il. et Od.—Virg. Æn. 2, 3, &c.—Dictys Cret 1, &c.—*Ovid. UMBRIA, a country of Italy, to the east of Etruria and north of the Sabine territory. The Umbri, or Umbranici, as they were called by the Greeks, have probably the best claim to the title of the Aborigines of Italy, for they seem to have occupied the central parts of the country, till they were expelled from them by the Tusci, the Sabini, and Latini, who are all supposed to have descended from them. In later times, the Senones, a colony of Gauls, invading Italy, dispossessed the Tusci of their newly acquired territory about the Padus, drove the Umbri from the shores of the Adriatic into the mountains and after beating the Romans on the banks of the Allia, sacked Rome. The Senones were afterwards vanquished and totally extirpated, and the whole of Umbria then became a Roman province; that part of it which the Senones inhabited for some time, was called Ager Gallicus or Gallicanus. Flor. 1, 17.—Plin. 3, 14.—Diodor. fr. 1, 19.—Strab. 5.—Liv. 9, 41.—Polyb. 2, 19.

UMBRO, a general who assisted Turnus against Æneas, and was killed during the war. He could assuage the fury of serpents by his songs, and counteract the poisonous effect of their bites. Virg. Æn. 7, 752. 10, 544.

UNCA, a surname of Minerva among the Phœnicians and Thebans. The goddess was first known in Egypt by that name, and Æschylus is the first Greek writer who gives her that appellation, which probably had been introduced into Bœotia by Cadmus. Æschyl. Sept. ante Th.

UNDECEMVIRI, magistrates at Athens, to whom such as were publicly condemned were delivered to be executed. C. Nep. in Phoc.

UNELLI, a people of Gallia Lugdunensis Secunda, whose country formed part of the Tractus Armoricus, and answers to the north-western extremity of modern Normandy, in what is now Cotentin. Cæs. B. G. 3, 1. 7, 75.—Hirt. 4, 1.

UNXIA, a surname of Juno, derived from ungere, to anoint, because it was usual among the Romans for the bride to anoint the threshold of her husband, and from this necessary ceremony wives were called Unxores, and afterwards Uxores. from Unxia, who presided over them.

VOCONIA LEX, de testamentis, by Q. Voconius Saxa, the tribune, A. U. C. 584, enacted, that no woman should be left heiress to an estate, and that no rich person should leave by his will more than the fourth part of his fortune to a woman. This step was taken to prevent the decay of the noblest and most illustrious of the families of Rome. This law was abrogated by Augustus.

VOCONTII, a people of Gallia Narbonensis, on the banks of a small stream called Druna or Drome, which falls into the Rhone about 100 miles from the mouth of that river. Their chief town was Vasa, now Die. Cæs. B. G. 1, 10.—Liv. 21, 31.—Mela, 2, 5.

VOGESUS, now la Vage, a mountain of Belgic Gaul, which separates the Sequani from the Lingones. It rises to an elevation of from 4000 to 5000 feet, and is covered with snow during great part of the year. In it are the sources of the Mosa, Mosella, and the Arar. Lucan. 1, 397.—Cæs. B. G. 4, 10.

VOLATERRÆ, now Volterra, a city of Etruria, north-west of Sena, and north east of Vetulonii. It stood nearly fifteen miles inland, on the right bank of the river Cæcina. It was the birthplace of the satirist Persius. Near Volaterræ, the Etrurians were beaten by the Romans under L. Corn. Scipio, B C. 200, and a long time afterwards, it sustained for two years a siege against Sylla.

VOLATERRÂNA VADA, a harbour on the coast of Etruria, deriving its name from the city of Volaterræ, which lay inland. It is still known by the name of Vada. Cic. pro Quinct. 6.—Plin. 3, 5.

VOLCÆ, a people in the southern part of Gallia Narbonensis, between the Garonne and the Rhone, divided into the Arecomici and Tectosages. Liv. 21, 26.—Mela, 2, 5.

VOLOGESES, a name common to many of the kings of Parthia, who made war against the Roman emperors. Tacit. Ann. 12, 14.

VOLSCENS, a Latin chief who discovered Nisus and Euryalus as they returned from the Rutulian camp loaded with spoils. He killed Euryalus, and was himself immediately stabbed by Nisus. Virg. Æn. 9, 370 et 442.

VOLSCI, at one time a more considerable and powerful people than any other in Latium. Their territory, on the coast, stretched from Antium to Tarracina, and extended, inland, beyond the river Liris to the borders of the Samnites and Marsi. Their capital was Antium. Liv. 1, 53. 6, 21.

VOLTUMNÆ FANUM, a spot in Etruria, where the general assembly of the Etrurians was held on solemn occasions Liv. 4, 23. 5, 17.

VOLSINIUM. Vid. Vulsinii.

VOLUBILIS, a town of Africa, in Mauritania Tingitana, on a branch of the river Subur, about midway between Banasa and mount Atlas. It has given name to the modern Velilli. Mela, 3, 10

VOLUMNIA, the wife of Coriolanus. Liv. 2, 40.——The freedwoman of Volumnius Eutrapelus. Cic. Phil. 2, 24.

VOLUMNIUS, T., a Roman famous for his friendship towards M. Lucullus, whom M. Antony had put to death. His great lamentations were the cause that he was dragged to the triumvir, of whom he demanded to be conducted to the body of his friend, and there to be put to death. His request was easily granted. Liv. 124, 20.——An Etrurian who wrote tragedies in his own native language.——A friend of M. Brutus. He was preserved when that great republican killed himself, and he wrote an account of his death and of his actions, from which Plutarch selected some remarks.

VOLUPTAS and VOLUPIA, the goddess of sensual pleasures, worshipped at Rome, where she had a temple. She was represented as a young and beautiful woman, well dressed, and elegantly adorned, seated on a throne, and having Virtue under her feet. Cic. de Nat. D. 2, 25.

VONONES, a king of Parthia expelled by his subjects, and afterwards placed on the throne of Armenia. Tacit. Ann. 12, 14.

VOPISCUS, FLAVIUS, one of the writers of the Augustan History. He was a native of Syracuse, and contemporary with Trebellius Pollio, having flourished towards the close of the third and in the early part of the fourth century. Of him we have yet the lives of Aurelian, Tacitus, Florian, Probus Firmus, Saturninus, Proculus, Bonosus, Carus, Numerianus, and Carinus. He excels the other writers of the Augustan history in method, minuteness, and learning. His works are contained in the Historiæ Augustæ Scriptores.

VOTIENUS MONTANUS, a man of learning, banished to one of the Baleares for his malevolent reflections upon Tiberius. Ovid has celebrated him as an excellent poet. Tacit. Ann. 4, 42

URANIA, one of the Muses, daughter of Jupiter and Mnemosyne, who presided over astronomy. She is generally called mother of Linus by Apollo, and of the god Hymenæus by Bacchus. She was represented as a young virgin dressed in an azure coloured robe, crowned with stars, and holding a globe in her hands, and having many mathematical instruments placed round. Hesiod. Theog. 77.—Apollod. 1, 2.—Hygin. fab. 161.——A surname of Venus, the same as Celestial. She was supposed, in that character, to preside over beauty and generation, and was called daughter of Uranus or Cœlus by the Light. Her temples in Asia, Africa, Greece, and Italy, were numerous Plato in Symp.—Cic. de Nat. D. 3, 23.

URANOPOLIS, a city on the peninsula of Athos, founded by Alexander, brother of Cassander. Its site is now called Calliste. Athen. 3, 54

URANUS, or OURANUS, a deity, the same as Cœlus, the most ancient of all the gods. He married Tithea, or the Earth by whom he had Ceus, Creus, Hyperion, Mnemosyne, Cottus, Phœbe, Briareus, Thetis, Saturn, Cyges, called from their mother Titans. His children conspired against him, because he confined them in the bosom of the earth, and his son Saturn mutilated him, and drove him from his throne. Hesiod. Th. 134.—Apollod. 1.

URCINIUM, a town on the western coast of Corsica, east of the Rhium Promontorium. It is now Ajaccio.

URGO, now Gorgona, an island in the bay of Pisa, opposite Leghorn, famous for anchovies. Plin. 3, 6.

URIA, a town on the coast of Apulia, giving name to the Sinus Urias, or gulf of Manfredonia. Strab. 6.—Plin. 3, 11.

USIPITES, or USIPII, a German tribe. Driven by the Suevi from the interior of Germany, the Usipites presented themselves on the banks of the Lower Rhine, crossed that stream, and passed through the territories of the Menapii into Gaul. Cæsar defeated them, and drove them back over the Rhine, and we then find them settling to the north of the Luppia, or Lippe, and reaching to the eastern mouth of the Rhine. At a subsequent period, they had their settlement between the Sieg and Lahn, but gradually merged into the name of Allemanni. Cæs. B. G. 4, 1, &c.

USTICA, a mountain and valley in the Sabine territory, near Horace's farm. Horat. Od. 1, 17, 11.

UTICA, now Porto Farina, a city of Africa, on the sea-coast, north-west of Carthage, and separated from its immediate district by the river Bagradas. It was the earliest, or one of the earliest colonies planted by Tyre on the African coast, and Bochart deduces the name from the Phœnician utica, i. e. "ancient." It was besieged in vain by Scipio, during the second Punic war, but at the beginning of the third, its inhabitants thought it advisable to surrender themselves willingly to the Romans, who then gained a firm footing in Africa, for which, after the destruction of Carthage, they were rewarded with the greater part of its flourishing territory, and their city was made the seat of the proconsul. Notwithstanding this, it never rose to any eminence, on account of its being so frequently the scene of contention during the civil wars of Rome; it was here that Pompey defeated the enemies of Sylla, that Curio fought with such imprudence for the cause of Cæsar, and the opponents of Cæsar fixed their head-quarters during their struggles against him. It was after this last unfortunate stand for the cause of freedom, that Cato, hence surnamed Uticensis, stabbed himself to prevent his falling into the hands of the dictator, B.C. 46 close to the ruins of that ones splendid city, whose utter destruction his ancestor had so unceasingly and remorselessly hurried on. Augustus raised it to the rank of a Roman colony, subsequent to which it recovered much of its greatness, but was only considered as the second city in the province after the rebuilding of Carthage. Justin. 18, 4.—Polyb. 1, 82 et 83. 3. 24. 36, 1.—*Diod. VULCANALIA, festivals in honour of Vulcan, brought to Rome from Præneste, and observed in the month of August. The streets were illuminated, fires kindled every where, and animal-thrown into the flames, as a sacrifice to the deity. Varro de L. L. 5. — Plin. 15, 18.

VULCANI INSULÆ, or VULCANIA, a name given to the islands between Sicily and Italy, now called Lipari. [Vid. Lipara.] They received it because there were there subterraneous fires, supposed to be excited by Vulcan, the god of fire.

VULCANUS, a god of the ancients, who presided over fire, and was the patron of all artists who worked iron and metals. He was son of Juno alone, who in this wished to imitate Jupiter, who had produced Minerva from his brains. According to Homer, he was son of Jupiter and Juno, and the mother was so disgusted with the deformities of her son, that she threw him into the sea, as soon as born, where he remained for nine years. According to the more received opinion, Vulcan was educated in heaven with the rest of the gods, but his father kicked him down from Olympus, when he attempted to deliver his mother, who had been fastened by a golden chain for her insolence. He was nine days in coming from heaven upon earth, and he fell in the island of Lemnos, where, according to Lucian, the inhabitants seeing him in the air, caught him in their arms. He, however, broke his leg by the fall, and ever after remained lame of one foot. He fixed his residence in Lemnos, where he built himself a palace, and raised forges to work metals. The inhabitants of the island became sensible of his industry, and were taught all the useful arts which could civilise their rude manners, and render them serviceable to the good of society. The first work of Vulcan was, according to some, a throne of gold with secret springs, which he presented to his mother to avenge himself for her want of affection towards him. Juno no sooner was seated on the throne, than she found herself unable to move. The gods attempted to deliver her by breaking the chains which held her, but to no purpose, and Vulcan alone had the power to set her at liberty. Bacchus intoxicated him, and prevailed upon him to come to Olympus, where he was reconciled to his parents. Vulcan has been celebrated by the ancient poets for the ingenious works and automatical figures which he made, and many speak of two golden statues, which not only seemed animated, but which walked by his side, and even assisted him in the working of metals. It is said, that at the request of Jupiter, he made the first woman that ever appeared on earth, well known under the name of Pandora. [Vid. Pandora.] The Cyclops of Sicily were his ministers and attendants, and with him they fabricated not only the thunderbolts of Jupiter, but also arms for the gods and the most celebrated heroes. His forges were supposed to be under mount Ætna, in the island of Sicily, as well as in every part of the earth where there were volcanos. The most known of the works of Vulcan which were presented to mortals are the arms of Achilles, those of Æneas, the shield of Hercules described by Hesiod, a collar given to Hermione, the wife of Cadmus, and a sceptre, which was in the possession of Agamemnon, king of Argos and Mycenæ. The collar proved fatal to all those that wore it, but the sceptre, after the death of Agamemnon, was carefully preserved at Cheronæa, and regarded as a divinity. The amours of Vulcan are not numerous. He demanded Minerva from Jupiter, who had promised him in marriage whatever goddess he should choose, and when she refused his addresses, he attempted to offer her violence. Minerva resisted with success, though there remained on her body some marks of Vulcan's passion, which she threw down upon earth wrapped up in wool. [Vid. Erichthonius.] This disappointment in his love was repaired by Jupiter, who gave him one of the Graces. Venus is universally acknowledged to have been the wife of Vulcan; but her infidelity is well known, as well as her amours with Mars, which were discovered by Phœbus, and exposed to the gods by her own husband. [Vid. Alectryon.] The worship of Vulcan was well established, particularly in Egypt, at Athens, and at Rome. It was usual in the sacrifices that were offered to him, to burn the whole victim, and not reserve part of it, as in the immolations to the rest of the gods. A calf and a boar pig were the principal victims offered. Vulcan was represented as covered with sweat, blowing with his vigorous arm the fires of his forges. His breast was hairy, and his forehead was blackened with smoke. Some represent him lame and deformed, holding a hammer raised in the air, ready to strike; while with the other hand he turns with pincers, a thunderbolt on his anvil, for which an eagle waits by his side to carry it to Jupiter. He appears on some monuments with a long beard, dishevelled hair, half naked, and a small round cap on his head, while he holds a hammer and pincers in his hand. The Egyptians represented him under the figure of a monkey. Vulcan has received the names of Mulciber, Pamphanes, Clytotechnes, Pandamator, Cyllopodes, Chalcopoda, &c. all expressive of his lameness and his profession. He was father of Cupid, by Venus; of Caculus, Cecrops, Cacus, Periphetes, Cercyon, Ocrisia, &c. Cicero speaks of more than one deity of the name of Vulcan. One he calls son of Cœlus and father of Apollo, by Minerva; the second he mentions is son of the Nile, and called Phtas by the Egyptians; the third was the son of Jupiter and Juno, and fixed his residence in Lemnos; and the fourth, who built his forges in the Lipari islands, was son of Menalius. That by Vulcan is understood fire, the name itself discovers if we believe Varro, who says that the word Vulcanus is derived from the force and violence of fire (Volicanus, quasi Volicanus, quod ignis aerem volitat, vel a vi ac volentia ignis,) and, therefore, he is painted with a blue hat, a symbol of the celestial or elementary fire. Some writers derive the name and story of Vulcan from Tubal-Cain mentioned by Moses (Gen. 4, 22.) Hesiod. Theog. et in Scut. Herc. 140 et 320. — Apollod. 1, 3, &c. — *Homer. VULCATIUS, Gallicanus, one of the writers of the Augustan History. He has the title of Vir Clarissimus, which indicates that he was a senator. Vulcatius lived under Diocletian, and proposed to himself to write a history of all the Roman emperors; we have from him, however, only the life of Avidius Cassius. Some manuscripts even assign this biography to Spartianus.

VULSINII, or Volsinii, and also Vulsinium, or Volsinium, a city of Etruria, situate on the northern shore of the Lacus Vulsiniensis. It is generally allowed to rank among the first cities

f the country. From Livy we learn that the Etruscan goddess Nortia, or Nursia, was worshipped there, and that it was customary to mark the years by fixing nails in her temple. Vulsinii was the birth-place of Sejanus. It is now Bolsena. Liv. 5, 31. 7, 3. 10, 37.—Juv. 3, 191. Tacit. Ann. 4, 1.

VULTURNUS, a town of Campania, at the mouth of the river Vulturnus, and on the left [illegible]. It is now Castel di Volturno. The origin of this city was probably Etruscan, but we do not find it mentioned in history until it became a Roman colony, A. U. C. 558. Strab. 5.—Vell. 3, 4. Plin. 3, 5. - Liv. 34, 45.

VULTURNUS, a river of Campania, now Volturno, rising among the Apennines, in the north-western corner of Samnium, and flowing with a southerly and westerly course of 100 miles into the Tuscan sea. A magnificent bridge with a triumphal arch was thrown over this river by Domitian, when he caused a road to be constructed from Sinuessa to Puteoli; a work which Statius has undertaken to eulogise in some hundred lines of indifferent poetry. Ovid. Met. 14, 715 - Lucan. 2, 423. Sil. Ital. 8, 530. Stat. Silv. 4, 3.——The wind which received the name of Vulturnus, when it blew from the side of the Vulturnus, highly incommoded the Romans at the battle of Cannæ. Liv. 22, 43 et 46.——A surname of Apollo on mount Lissus in Ionia, near Ephesus. The god received his name from a shepherd, who raised him a temple after he had been drawn out of a subterranean cavern by vultures.

UXANTIS, an island off the coast of Gaul, now Ushant.

UXELLODUNUM, a city in Aquitanic Gaul, in the territory of the Cadurci, now Le Puy d' Issolu. It was remarkable for the siege which it sustained against Cæsar, being the last place in Gaul which held out against him. Cæs. B. G. 8, 33.

UXII, a mountaineer race occupying the ranges thus run on each side of the river Orontis, and separate Persis from Susiana. They were an insolent set of robbers, compelling all who passed through their territory to pay them tribute, until they were reduced to obedience by Alexander the Great. Diod. 17, 67.—Arrian. Ind. 3, 18.—Plin. 6, 27.

XANTHI, the inhabitants of Xanthus in Asia. Vid Xanthus.

XANTHICA, a festival observed by the Macedonians in the month called Xanthicus, the same as April. It was then usual to make a lustration of the army with great solemnity. A bitch was cut into two parts, and one half of the body placed on one side, and the other part on the other side, after which the soldiers marched between, and they imitated a real battle by a sham engagement.

XANTHUS, or XANTHOS, a river of Troas, in Asia Minor. It is the same as the Scamander, but according to Homer, it was called Xanthus by the gods, and Scamander by men. [Vid. Scamander.] A river of Lycia, ancient[illegible] called Sirbis. It was sacred to Apollo, and fell into the sea, near Patara. Homer. Il. 6, 172.—Virg. Æn. 4, 143.—Mela 1, 15.——One of the horses of Achilles, who spoke to his master when chid with severity, and told him that he must soon be killed. Homer. Il. 19.——One of the horses given to Juno by Neptune, and afterwards to the sons of Leda. A king of Bœotia, who made war against the Athenians. He was killed by the artifice of Melanthus. [Vid. Apaturia.]—— A philosopher of Samos, in whose house Æsop lived some time as servant.——A town of Lycia on the river of the same name, at the distance of about fifteen miles from the sea shore. The inhabitants were remarkable for their love of liberty, which led them to destroy themselves rather than submit to the yoke either of the Persians or Romans: after having bravely resisted the attack made on them by the latter under Brutus, they set fire to their houses, and rushed into the flames with such obstinacy, that Brutus, though he wished to save them, and offered rewards to his troops for all that they brought alive to him, was only able to take 150 of them prisoners. Plut. in Brut. — Appian. B. C. 4, 76.—Dio Cass. 47, 34.

XANTIPPE, a daughter of Dorus who married Pleuron, by whom she had Agenor, &c. Apollod. 1, 7.——The wife of Socrates, remarkable for her ill humour and peevish disposition, which has become proverbial. Some suppose that the philosopher was acquainted with her moroseness and insolence before he married her, and that he took her for his wife to try his patience, and inure himself to the malevolent reflections of mankind. She continually tormented him with her impertinences; and one day, not satisfied with using the most bitter invectives, she emptied a vessel of dirty water upon his head upon which the philosopher coolly observed after thunder there generally falls rain. Xantippe was without doubt a woman of a high and unmanageable spirit. Socrates himself, however, allows that she possessed many domestic virtues; and towards the close of his life, and during his imprisonment, she expressed great affection for her husband; and, indeed, after twenty years' experience, it would have been strange if it had been otherwise. Ælian V. H. 7, 10. 9. 7. 19, 12.—Diog. in Socrat.

XANTIPPUS, a Lacedæmonian general who assisted the Carthaginians in the first Punic war. He defeated the Romans, 256 B. C. and took the celebrated Regulus prisoner. Such signal services deserved to be rewarded, but the Carthaginians looked with envious jealousy upon Xantippus, and he retired to Corinth after he had saved them from destruction. Some authors support that the Carthaginians ordered him to be assassinated, and his body to be thrown into the sea as he was returning home; which others say that they had prepared a leaky ship to convey him to Corinth, which he carefully avoided. Liv. 18 et 28, 43.—— An Athenian general who defeated the Persian fleet at Mycale with Leotychides. A statue was erected to his honour in the citadel of Athens. He made some conquests in Thrace, and increased the power of Athens. He was father to the celebrated Pericles, by Agariste, the niece o Clisthenes, who expelled the Pisistratidæ from Athens. Paus. 3, 7. 8, 52. —A son of Pericles, who disgraced his father by his disobedience, his ingratitude, and his extravagance. He died of the plague in the Peloponnesian war. Plut.

XENARCHUS, a peripatetic philosopher of Seleucia, who taught at Alexandria and at Rome, and was intimate with Augustus.—A praetor of the Achæan league, who wished to favour the interest of Perseus, king of Macedonia, against the Romans.

XENIADES, a Corinthian who went to buy Diogenes the Cynic, when sold as a slave. He asked him what he could do? upon which the Cynic answered, command freemen. This noble answer, so pleased Xeniades, that he gave the Cynic his liberty, and entrusted him with the care and the education of his children. Aul. Gell. 2, 18.

XENIUS, a surname given to Jupiter as the god of hospitality.

XENOCLÆA, a priestess of Apollo's temple at Delphi, from whom Hercules extorted an oracle by force when she refused to answer him because he was not purified of the blood and death of Iphitus. Paus. 10, 13.

XENOCLES, an Athenian tragic poet, ridiculed by Aristophanes, and yet the conqueror of Euripides on one occasion, B C. 415. He was of swarthy stature, and son of the tragic poet Carcinus. In the Pax, Aristophanes applies the term μογγεράδης to the family. From the scholiast it appears that Xenocles was celebrated for introducing machinery and stage-shows, especially in the ascent or descent of his gods.—A Spartan officer in the expedition which Agesilaus undertook against the Persians.—An architect of Eleusis.—A celebrated rhetorician of Adramyttium, who accompanied Cicero in Asia. Cic. Br. 91.—Strab. 13.

XENOCRATES, an ancient philosopher born at Chalcedon, and educated in the school of Plato, whose friendship he gained, and whose approbation he merited. Though of a dull and sluggish disposition, he supplied the defects of nature by unwearied attention and industry, and was at last found capable of succeeding in the school of Plato after Speusippus, about 339 years before Christ. He was remarkable as a disciplinarian, and he required that his pupils should be acquainted with mathematics before they came under his care, and he even rejected some who had not the necessary qualification, saying that they had not yet found the key of philosophy. He recommended himself to his pupils not only by precepts, but more powerfully by example, and since the wonderful change he had made upon the conduct of one of his auditors, [Vid. Polemon,] his company was as much shunned by the disolute and extravagant, as it was coveted by the virtuous and benevolent. Philip of Macedon attempted to gain his confidence with money, but with no success. Alexander in this imitated his father, and sent some of his friends with 50 talents for the philosopher. They were introduced, and supped with Xenocrates. The repast was small, frugal, and elegant, without ostentation. On the morrow, the officers of Alexander wished to pay down the 50 talents, but the philosopher asked them whether they had not perceived from the entertainment of the preceding day, that he was not in want of money: Tell your master, said he, to keep his money; he has more people to maintain than I have. Yet not to offend the monarch, he accepted of a small sum, about the 200th part of one talent. His character was not less conspicuous in every other particular, and he has been cited as an instance of virtue from the following circumstance: The courtezan Lais had pledged herself to forfeit an immense sum of money, if she did not triumph over the virtue of Xenocrates. She tried every art, assumed the most captivating looks, and used the most tempting attitudes to gain the philosopher, but in vain; and she declared at last, that she had not lost her money, as she had engaged herself to conquer a human being, not a lifeless stone. Though so respected and admired, yet Xenocrates was poor, and he was dragged to prison, because he was unable to pay a small tribute to the state. He was delivered from confinement by one of his friends. His integrity was so well known, that when he appeared in the court as a witness, the judges dispensed with his oath. He died B.C. 314, in his 82d year, after he had presided in the academy for above 25 years. It is said, that he fell in the night with his head into a basin of water, and that he was suffocated. He had written above 60 treatises on different subjects, all now lost. He taught that the heavens are divine, and the stars celestial gods; and that besides these divinities, there are terrestrial demons, of a middle order between the gods and man, which partake of the nature both of mind and body, and are therefore, like human beings, capable of passions, and liable to diversity of character. Diog.—Cic. ad Attic. 10, 1. &c. Tusc. 5, 32.—Val. Max. 2, 10.—A physician in the age of Nero, not in great esteem. His Greek treatise, de alimento ex aquatilibus, is best edited by Franzius, Lips. 8vo. 1774.

XENOPHANES, a Greek philosopher of Colophon, disciple of Archelaus, born B C. 556. He wrote several poems and treatises, and founded a sect which was called the Eleatic. Wild in his opinions about astronomy, he supposed that the stars were extinguished every morning, and rekindled at night; that eclipses were occasioned by the temporary extinctions of the sun; that the moon was inhabited, and 18 times bigger than the earth; and that there were several suns and moons for the convenience of the different climates of the earth. In metaphysics he taught, that if ever there had been a time when nothing existed, nothing could ever have existed; that whatever is, always has been from eternity; that nature is without limit; that what is one, is similar in all its parts, else it would be many; that the one infinite, eternal, and homogeneous universe, is incapable of change; that God is one incorporeal eternal being, of the same nature with the universe, comprehending all things within himself; that he is intelligent and pervades all things, and bears no resemblance to human nature, either in body or mind. Xenophanes possessed the chair of philosophy about seventy years, and lived to the age of a hundred. Cic. Quæst. 4, 37. de Div. 1, 3. de Nat. D. 1, 11.

XENOPHON, an Athenian son of Gryllus, celebrated as a general, an historian, and a philosopher. In the school of Socrates he received those instructions and precepts which afterwards so eminently distinguished him at the head of an army, in literary solitude, and as the prudent father of a family. He was invited by Proxenus, one of his intimate friends, to accompany Cyrus the younger in an expedition against his brother Artaxerxes, king of Persia; but he refused to comply without previously consulting his venerable master, and inquiring into the propriety of such a measure. Socrates strongly opposed it, and observed, that it might raise the resentment of the countrymen, as Sparta had made an alliance with the Persian monarch; but, however, before he proceeded further he advised him to consult the oracle of Apollo. Xenophon paid due deference to the injunctions of Socrates, but as he was ambitious of glory, and eager to engage in a distant expedition, he hastened with precipitation to Sardis, where he was introduced to the young prince, and treated with great attention. In the army of Cyrus, Xenophon showed that he was a true disciple of Socrates, and that he had been educated in the warlike city of Athens. After the decisive battle in the plains of Cunaxa, and the fall of young Cyrus, the prudence and vigour of his mind were called into action. The ten thousand Greeks who had followed the standard of an ambitious prince, were now at the distance of above 600 leagues from their native home, in a country surrounded on every side by a victorious enemy, without money without provisions, and without a leader. Xenophon was selected from among the officers, to superintend the retreat of his countrymen, and though he was often opposed by malevolence and envy, yet his persuasive eloquence and his activity convinced the Greeks that no general could extricate them from every difficulty, better than the disciple of Socrates. He rose superior to danger, and though under continual alarms from the sudden attacks of the Persians, he was enabled to cross rapid rivers, penetrate through vast deserts, gain the tops of mountains, till he could rest secure for a while, and refresh his tired companions. This celebrated retreat was at last happily effected, the Greeks returned home after a march of 1155 parasangs, or leagues, which was performed in 215 days, after an absence of 15 months. The whole perhaps might now be forgotten, or at least obscurely known, if the great philosopher who planned it, had not employed his pen in describing the dangers which he escaped, and the difficulties which he surmounted. He was no sooner returned from Cunaxa, than he sought new honours in following the fortune of Agesilaus in Asia. He enjoyed his confidence, he fought under his standard, and conquered with him in the Asiatic provinces, as well as at the battle of Coronea. His fame, however, did not escape the aspersions of jealousy, he was publicly banished from Athens for accompanying Cyrus against his brother, and being now without a home, he retired to Scillus, a small town of the Lacedæmonians, in the neighbourhood of Olympia. In his solitary retreat he dedicated his time to literary pursuits, and as he had acquired riches in his Asiatic expeditions, he began to adorn and variegate by the hand of art for his pleasure and enjoyment, the country which surrounded Scillus. He built a magnificent temple to Diana, in imitation of that of Ephesus, and spent part of his time in rural employments, or in hunting in the woods and mountains. His peaceful occupations, however, were soon disturbed. A war arose between the Lacedæmonians and Elis, and the sanctity of Diana's temple, and the venerable age of the philosopher, who lived in the delightful retreats of Scillus, were disregarded, and Xenophon, driven by the Elians from his favourite spot, where he had composed and written for the information of posterity, and the honour of his country, retired to the city of Corinth. In this place he died in the 90th year of his age, 359 years before the Christian era. The works of Xenophon are numerous. He wrote an account of the expedition of Cyrus, called the Anabasis, and as he had no inconsiderable share in the enterprise, his descriptions must be authentic, as he was himself an eye witness. Many however have accused him of partiality. He appeared often too fond of extolling the virtues of his favourite Cyrus, and while he describes with contempt the imprudent operations of the Persians, he does not neglect to show that he was a native of Greece. His Cyropædia, divided into eight books, has given rise to much criticism, and while some warmly maintain that it is a faithful account of the life and the actions of Cyrus the Great, and declare that it is supported by the authority of scripture; others as vehemently deny its authenticity. According to the opinions of Plato and of Cicero, the Cyropædia of Xenophon was a moral romance, and these venerable philosophers support, that the historian did not so much write what Cyrus had been, as what every true, good, and virtuous monarch ought to be. His Hellenica were written as a continuation of the history of Thucydides; and in his Memorabilia of Socrates, and in his Apology, he has shown himself, as Valerius Maximus observes, a perfect master of the philosophy of that great man, and he has explained his doctrines and moral precepts with all the success of persuasive eloquence, and conscious integrity. These are the most famous of his compositions, besides which there are other small tracts, his eulogium given on Agesilaus, his œconomics, or the duties of domestic life, the dialogue entitled Hiero, in which he happily describes and compares the misery which attended the tyrant, with the felicity of a virtuous prince; a treatise on hunting, the symposium of the philosophers, on the government of Athens and Sparta, a treatise on the revenues of Attica, &c. The simplicity and the elegance of Xenophon's diction have procured him the name of the Athenian muse, and the bee of Greece, and they have induced Quintilian to say, that these graces dictated his language, and that the goddess of Persuasion dwelt upon his lips. He received however a more noble appellation, the surname of Benefactor, when with arms in his hands, and with all the eagerness of humanity and valour, he forced his victorious troops to abandon the plunder of Byzantium, and to spare a prostrate enemy. His sentiments, as to the Divinity and religion were the same as those of the venerable Socrates; he supported the immortality of the soul, and exhorted his friends to cultivate those virtues which ensure the happiness of mankind, with all the zeal and fervour of a Christian. He has been quoted as an instance of tenderness and of resignation on Providence. As he was offering a sacrifice, he was informed that Gryllus, his eldest son, had been killed at the battle of Mantinea. Upon this he tore the garland from his head, but when he was told that his son had died like a Greek, and had given a mortal wound to Epaminondas, the enemy's general, he replaced the flowers on his head, and continued the sacrifice, exclaiming that the pleasure he derived from the valour of his son, was greater than the grief which his unfortunate death occasioned. The best editions of the works of Xenophon are, that of Schneider, 6 vols. 8vo. Lips. 1815; and that of Weiske, 6 vols 8vo. Lips. 1796–1804. XERXES, 1st, succeeded his father Darius on the throne of Persia, though but the second son of the monarch, he was preferred to his elder brother Artabazanes, The causes alleged for this preference were, that Artabazanes was son of Darius when a private man, and that Xerxes was born, after his father had been raised on the Persian throne, of Atossa, the daughter of Cyrus. Xerxes continued the warlike preparations of his father, and added the revolted kingdom of Egypt to his extensive possessions. He afterwards invaded Europe, and entered Greece with an army, which, together with the numerous retinue of servants, eunuchs, and women that attended it, amounted to no less than 5,283,220 souls. This multitude, which the fidelity of the historians has not exaggerated, was stopped at Thermopylæ, by the valour of 300 Spartans, under king Leonidas. Xerxes, astonished that such a handful of men should dare to oppose his progress, ordered some of his soldiers to bring them alive into his presence; but for three successive days the most valiant of the Persian troops were repeatedly defeated in attempting to execute the monarch's injunctions, and the courage of the Spartans might perhaps have triumphed longer, if a Trachinian had not led a detachment to the top of the mountain, and suddenly fallen upon the devoted Leonidas. The king himself nearly perished on this occasion, and it has been reported, that in the night, the desperate Spartans sought, for a while, the royal tent, which they found deserted, and wandered through the Persian army, slaughtering thousands before them. The battle of Thermopylæ was the beginning of the disgrace of Xerxes; the more he advanced, he was to experience new disappointments; his fleet was defeated at Artemisium and Salamis, and though he burnt the deserted city of Athens, and trusted to the artful insinuations of Themistocles, yet he found his millions unable to conquer a nation that was superior to him in the knowledge of war and maritime affairs. Mortified with the ill success of his expedition, and apprehensive of imminent danger in an enemy's country, Xerxes hastened to Persia, and in thirty days he marched over all that territory which before he had passed with much pomp and parade in the space of six months. Mardonius, the best of his generals, was left behind with an army of 300,000 men, and the rest, that had survived the ravages of war, of famine, and pestilence, followed their timid monarch into Thrace, whose steps were marked by the numerous birds of prey that hovered round him, and fed upon the dead carcases of the Persians. When he reached the Hellespont, Xerxes found the bridge of boats which he had erected there, totally destroyed by the storms, and he crossed the straits in a small fishing vessel. Restored to his kingdom and safety, he forgot his dangers, his losses, and his defeats, and gave himself up to riot and debauchery. His indolence and luxurious voluptuousness offended his subjects, and Artabanus, the captain of his guards, conspired against him, and murdered him in his bed, in the 21st year of his reign, about 464 years before the Christian era. The personal accomplishments of Xerxes have been commended by ancient authors, and Herodotus observes that there was not one man among the millions of his army, that was equal to the monarch in comeliness or stature, or that was as worthy to preside over a great and extensive empire. The picture is finished, and the character of Xerxes completely known, when we hear Justin exclaim, that the vast armament which invaded Greece was without a head. Xerxes has been cited as an instance of humanity. When he reviewed his millions from a stately throne in the plains of Asia, he suddenly shed a torrent of tears, on the recollection that the multitude of men which he saw before his eyes, in one hundred years should be no more. His pride and insolence have been deservedly censured; he ordered chains to be thrown into the sea, and the waves to be whipped, because the first bridge he had laid across the Hellespont had been destroyed by a storm. He cut a channel through mount Athos, and saw his fleet sail in a place which before was dry ground. The very rivers were dried up by his army as he advanced towards Greece, and the cities which he entered reduced to want and poverty. Herod. 1, 183. 7, 2, &c. *Æschyl. V. ZABATUS, a river of Media, falling into the Tigris, near which the ten thousand Greeks stopped in their return. It is also called Zabus, Zerbis, Lycus, and, by modern travellers, Zab. Farther down, another river, named Zabus Minor, and otherwise Lycus, is also received into the Tigris, and is now called Altun Sou, or the golden river. Polyb. 5 51.—Amm. Marc. 23, 14.—*Xen. ZACYNTHUS a native of Bœotia, who accompanied Hercules when he went into Spain to destroy Geryon. At the end of the expedition, he was entrusted with the care of Geryon's flocks, by the hero, and ordered to conduct them to Thebes. As he went on his journey, he was bit by a serpent, and some time after died. —An island in the Ionian sea to the west of the Peloponnesus, and below Cephallenia. It is said to have obtained its name from Zacynthus, the son of Dardanus, an Arcadian chief. It once received a colony of Achæans from the Peloponnesus. Its principal town was Zacynthus, a place of considerable importance, with a strong citadel called Psophis. At the southern extremity of the island were some remarkable pitch-wells, which are still made available. The modern name of Zacynthus is Zante. *Homer. ZALEUCUS, a lawgiver of the Locrians in Italy, and one of the disciples of Pythagoras, 550 B C. He was very humane and at the same time very austere, and he attempted to enforce his laws more by inspiring shame than dread. He had wisely decreed, that a person guilty of adultery should lose both his eyes. His philosophy was called to a trial, when he was informed that his son was an adulterer. He ordered the law to be executed, the people interfered, but Zaleucus resisted, and rather than violate his own institutions, he commanded one of his own eyes, and one of those of his son to be put out. This made such an impression upon the people, that while Zaleucus presided over the Locrians, no person was again found guilty of adultery. *Val. ZAMA, a city of Numidia, five days' journey west of Carthage, celebrated for the victory obtained there over Hannibal, by Scipio Africanus the elder, B. C 201, which put an end to the second Punic war. It afterwards fell into the hands of the Numidian kings, and was chosen by them as their usual place of residence, whence it received the surname of Regia. It was besieged in vain by Metellus, during the Jugurthine war, and was remarkable for its inhabitants refusing to admit their king Juba within its gates, after his defeat at Thapsus, owing to his having resolved, if unsuccessful against Cæsar, to destroy himself and the city. Its modern name is Zowarcen. Hist. Af. 91.—C. Nep. in Hannib. Liv 30. 29.—Sallust de Jug.—Flor. 3, 1.—Sil. Ital. 3, 261.—Strab. 17.

ZAMOLXIS, a celebrated person among the Scythians, is reported to have been the slave of Pythagoras, and to have accompanied his master into Egypt, where he was manumitted, and whence he carried his doctrine to his countrymen, the Getæ. It is added, that having disclosed the immortality of the soul to this people, in order to give them evidence of its truth, he dug a subterraneous apartment, in which he concealed himself three years, and then re-appearing as from the dead, fully established his authority as a teacher. Herodotus, however, who relates this story, seems to give it little credit, and professes his belief that Zamolxis lived long before Pythagoras. The truth seems to be, that he was a Thracian, who at a remote period inculcated the doctrine of the immortality of the soul among the Scythians, and was after his death regarded by them as a divinity, with whom they were to dwell in the invisible world. The same historian says, that on certain festal days they chose by lot several persons, who were to be sent as messengers to Zamolxis, and whom they sent to death, by throwing them up in the air, and catching them on the points of their spears; a circumstance not improbable among a barbarous people, who are known to have practised human sacrifices. Diod.—Herod. 4, 10, &c.

ZEBINA, ALEXANDER, an impostor who usurped the throne of Syria, at the instigation of Ptolemy Physcon.

ZELA, a city of Pontus, south-east of, and not far from, Amasea. It was originally a village, but Pompey increased it, and raised it to the rank of a city. It is rendered remarkable in history, by a victory obtained over the Roman forces under Triarius, by Mithridates, and still more by the defeat and discomfiture of Pharnaces, son of the latter, which Cæsar expressed in the laconic sentence—"Veni, vidi, vici." The modern village of Zeleh occupies the site of the ancient city. Strab. 12.—Plin. 6, 3.—Appian. Mithr. 89.—Veritus, B. A. 72.

ZENO, a philosopher of Elia or Velia in Italy, the disciple, or, according to some, the adopted son of Parmenides, and the supposed inventor of dialectic. It is said that he attempted to deliver his country from the tyranny of Nearchus. His plot was discovered, and he was exposed to the most excruciating torments to reveal the name of his accomplices; but this he bore with unparalleled fortitude, and not to be at last conquered by tortures, he cut off his tongue with his teeth, and spit it into the face of the tyrant. Some say that he was pounded alive in a mortar, and that in the midst of his torments he called to Nearchus, as if to reveal something of importance; the tyrant approached him, and Zeno, as if willing to whisper to him, caught his ear with his teeth, and bit it off.——The founder of the sect of the Stoics, born at Citium in the island of Cyprus.——His father, Mnaseas, was a merchant, who, in his professional concerns, having frequently occasion to visit Athens, purchased several writings of the Socratic philosophers for the use of his son, who early displayed a great propensity to learning, which the father was liberal enough to encourage. Zeno was born about B.C. 360, and in his 30th year took a voyage to Athens, carrying with him, it is said, a cargo of Phœnician purple, which was lost by shipwreck on the coast of Attica. Going into a bookseller's shop, he took up a volume of Xenophon's commentaries, and reading some passages of it, was so much delighted, that he enquired of the bookseller where such men were to be met with. Crates, the cynic philosopher, happened at that instant to pass by, when the shopkeeper, pointing to him, said, "Follow that man." Zeno from that time became an attendant upon the lectures of Crates, but the modesty of his character would not permit him to copy the cynic disregard to the ordinary decorums of life. He was likewise desirous of extending the sphere of his knowledge beyond the narrow limits of a sect which prided itself in the contempt of every kind of science. He, therefore, became an auditor of other masters who professed to instruct their disciples in the nature of things, and he entered the school of Stilpo. Crates, unwilling to lose a promising follower, attempted to drag him thence by force; but Zeno said to him, "You may seize my body, but Stilpo has got hold of my mind." After an attendance of some years upon Stilpo, he became a disciple of Xenocrates and Diodorus Chronus, from the latter of whom he learnt the dialectic art; and he was so much delighted with the ingenious subtleties communicated to him by this master, that he rewarded him with a large sum of money. He finished his course of instruction in the school of Polemo, who, aware of his intention to collect materials on all sides for some purpose of his own, said to him, "I am not unacquainted, Zeno, with the Phœnician disguises which you creep into gardens to rob the fruit." Having thus informed himself of every part of the philosophy then taught in Greece, he resolved to become the founder of a new sect. He chose for his school a place called the Pœcile (Ποικίλη Στοά), or Painted Porch, from its being adorned with the pictures of Polygnotus and other eminent painters; and the Στοά, or Porch, by way of distinction; and from the latter appellation his followers acquired the name of Stoics. He obtained great fame by the acuteness of his reasonings, a quality much admired among the Greeks; and his private character being also highly respectable, he was much beloved and esteemed by his numerous disciples, and was honoured with the notice of the great Antigonus Gonatus, king of Macedon, when at Athens, attended his lectures, and invited him to his court; but so little was he disposed to make an interested use of royal favour, that when an acquaintance offered to procure him some grant from the king, he declined all further intercourse with him. The Athenians placed such confidence in his integrity, that they deposited the keys of their citadel in his hands, and decreed him a golden crown and a statue. He is said to have come very rich to Greece; but he lived with great simplicity and abstemiousness, keeping only one servant, and limiting himself to bread and fruits at table, at which the great were frequently his guests. In other pleasures he was equally continent; and the modesty of his disposition led him to shun crowds and personal distinction. Zeno was tall and slender, with a severe aspect, and a contracted brow. His constitution was naturally weak, but by temperance his life was prolonged to extreme old age. He had reached his 98th year, when falling by accident he broke one of his fingers. Taking this as a warning to depart, he struck the ground with his hand, and repeating from the tragedy of Niobe the line, Ἔρχομαι, τί μ' αὖεις; I am coming, why callest thou me? went home and strangled himself, pursuant to the philosophical tenet, that a man's life was always at his own disposal. The Athenians honoured him with a public funeral in the Ceramicus, and a tomb, with an inscription recording that his memory was thus cherished on account of the precepts of virtue which he inculcated on the youths who were his auditors. He died B.C. 264. If we compare the doctrines of Zeno with the history of his life, his heterogeneous system will appear to have been compiled out of the various tenets of the schools which he frequented; and on the credit of these he assumed to himself the title of the founder of a new sect, which spread widely, and subsisted for many ages. Of Zeno, Cicero says, that he had little reason for deserting his masters, especially those of the Platonic school, and that he was not so much an inventor of new opinions as of new terms. Zeno transferred the dialectics of Diodorus Chronus, and the moral doctrine of the Cynic sect, into his own system; the principal difference between the Cynics and Stoics consisting in this particular, that the former disdained the cultivation of nature, and the latter affected to rise above it. On the subject of physics, Zeno received his doctrine from Pythagoras and Heraclitus, through the channel of the Platonic school. The moral part of the Stoical philosophy partook of the defects of its origin. It may be as justly objected against the Stoics as the Cynics, that they assumed an artificial severity of manners, and a tone of virtue above the condition of man. Their doctrine of moral wisdom was an ostentatious display of words, in which little regard was paid to nature and reason. It professed to raise human nature to a degree of perfection before unknown; but its real effect was, merely to amuse the ear, and captivate the happy, with fictions which can never be realised. According to the Stoical doctrine concerning nature, there existed from eternity a dark confused chaos, in which were contained the first principles of all future beings; which chaos, being at length arranged, and emerging into variable forms, became the world, as it now subsists. The universe, though one whole, contains two principles distinct from elements; one passive, which is pure matter, without qualities, and the other active, which is reason or God. With respect to the doctrine of divine providence, it appears that, according to the Stoics, the Deity of the deity is nothing more than the active portion of a celestial ether, or fire, possessed of intelligence, which at first gave form to the shapeless mass of gross matter, and being always essentially united to the visible world, by the same necessary agency, preserves its order and harmony. Providence, in the Stoic creed, is only another name for absolute necessity, or fate, to which God and matter, or the universe, which consists of both, is immutably subject. The Stoic doctrine of the resurrection of the body, upon which Seneca has written with so much elegance, must not be confounded with the Christian doctrine; for, according to the Stoics, men return to life, not by the voluntary appointment of a wise and merciful God, but by the law of fate; and are not renewed for the enjoyment of a better and happier condition, but drawn back into their former state of imperfection and misery. The Stoical doctrine of morals is founded on the principles of physics. Conceiving God to be the principal part of nature, by whose energy all bodies are formed, moved, and arranged, and human reason to be a portion of the Divinity, it was their fundamental doctrine in ethics, that human life one ultimate end ought for its own sake to be pursued; and that this end is, to live agreeably to nature, that is, to be conformed to the law of fate by which the world is governed, and to the reason of that divine and celestial fire which animates all things. Since man is himself a microcosm, composed, like the world, of matter and a rational principle, it becomes him to live as a part of the great whole, and to accommodate all his desires and pursuits to the general arrangement of nature. To live according to nature, as the Stoics teach, is virtue, and virtue is itself happiness; for the supreme good is, to live according to a just conception of the real nature of things, choosing that which is in itself eligible, and rejecting the contrary. Every man having within himself a capacity of discerning and following the law of nature, has his happiness in his own power, and is a divinity to himself. Wisdom, say the Stoics, consists in distinguishing good from evil. Good is that which produces happiness according to the nature of a rational being. Since those things only are truly good which are becoming and virtuous, and virtue, which is seated in the mind, is alone sufficient for happiness, external things contribute nothing towards happiness, and therefore are not in themselves good. The wise man will only value riches, honour, beauty, and other external enjoyments, as means and instruments of virtue; for, in every condition, he is happy in the possession of a mind accommodated to nature. Pain, which does not belong to the mind, is no evil. The wise man will be happy in the midst of torture. All external things are indifferent, since they cannot affect the happiness of man. Every virtue being a conformity to nature, and every vice a deviation from it, all virtues and vices are equal. One act of beneficence or justice is not more truly so than another; one fraud is not more a fraud than another; therefore there is no other difference in the essential nature of moral actions, than that some are vicious and others virtuous. This is the doctrine which Horace ridicules in the 4th satire, 1st book. The Stoics advanced many extravagant assertions concerning their wise man; for example, that he feels neither pain nor pleasure; that he exercises no pity; that he is free from faults; that he is divine; that he does all things well; that he alone is great, noble, ingenious; that he is a prophet, a priest, a king, and the like. These paradoxical vaunt ings are humorously ridiculed by Horace. The sum of man's duty, according to the Stoics, with respect to himself, is to subdue his passions of joy and sorrow, hope and fear, and even pity. He who is, in this respect, perfectly master of himself, is a wise man; and, in proportion as we approach a state of apathy, we advance towards perfection. Concerning the whole moral system of the Stoics, it must be remarked, that, although it be highly deserving of praise for the purity, extent, and variety of its doctrines, and although it must be confessed, that in many select passages of the Stoic writings it appears exceedingly brilliant, it nevertheless founded on false notions of nature and of man, and is raised to a degree of refinement which is extravagant and impracticable. The piety which it teaches, is nothing more than a quiet submission to irresistible fate. The self-command which it enjoins, annihilates the best affections of the human heart. The indulgence which it grants to suicide is inconsistent, not only with the genuine principles of piety, but even with that constancy which was the height of Stoical perfection. And even its moral doctrine of benevolence is tinctured with the fanciful principle, which lay at the foundation of the whole Stoic system, that every being is a portion of one great whole, from which it would be unnatural and impious to attempt a separation. *Diog. ZENOBIA, a queen of Iberia, wife to Rhadamistus. She accompanied her husband when he was banished from his kingdom by the Armenians; but as she was unable to follow him on account of her pregnancy, she entreated him to murder her. Rhadamistus long hesitated, but fearful of her falling into the hands of his enemy, he obeyed, and threw her body into the Araxes. Her clothes kept her up on the surface of the water, where she was found by some shepherds, and as the wound was not mortal, her life was preserved, and she was carried to Tri-dated, who acknowledged her as queen. Tacit. Ann. 12, 51.——Septimia, a celebrated princess of Palmyra, who married Odenatus, whom Gallienus acknowledged as his partner on the Roman throne. After the death of her husband, which, according to some authors, she is said to have hastened, Zenobia reigned in the east as regent of her infant children, who were honoured with the title of Cæsars. She assumed the name of Augusta, and she appeared in imperial robes, and ordered herself to be styled the queen of the east. The troubles which at that time agitated the western parts of the empire, prevented the emperor from checking the insolence and ambition of this princess, who boasted to be sprung from the Ptolemies of Egypt. Aurelian was no sooner invested with the imperial purple than he marched into the east, determined to punish the pride of Zenobia. He well knew her valour, and he was not ignorant that in her wars against the Persians, she had distinguished herself no less than Odenatus. She was the mistress of the east; Egypt acknowledged her power, and all the provinces of Asia Minor were subject to her command. When Aurelian approached the plains of Syria, the Palmyrean queen appeared at the head of 700,000 men. She bore the labours of the field like the meanest of her soldiers, and walked on foot fearless of danger. Two battles were fought; the courage of the queen gained the superiority, but an imprudent evolution of the Palmyrean cavalry ruined her cause; and while they pursued with spirit the flying enemy, the Roman infantry suddenly fell upon the main body of Zenobia's army, and the defeat was inevitable. The queen fled to Palmyra, determined to support a siege. Aurelian followed her, and after he had almost exhausted his stores, he proposed terms of accommodation, which were rejected with disdain by the warlike princess. Her hopes of victory were soon vanished, and though she harassed the Romans night and day by continual sallies from her walls, and the working of her military engines, she despaired of success when she heard that the armies which were marching to her relief from Armenia, Persia, and the east, had partly been defeated and partly bribed from her allegiance. She fled from Palmyra in the night, but Aurelian, who was apprised of her escape, pursued her, and she was caught as she was crossing the river Euphrates. She was brought into the presence of Aurelian, and though the soldiers were clamorous for her death, she was reserved to adorn the triumph of the conqueror. She was treated with great humanity, and Aurelian gave her large possessions near Tibur, where she was permitted to live the rest of her days in peace, with all the grandeur and majesty which became a queen of the east, and a warlike princess. Her children were presented to the emperor, and married to persons of the first distinction at Rome. Zenobia has been considered not only for her military abilities, but also for her literary talents. She was acquainted with every branch of useful learning, and spoke with fluency the language of the Egyptians, the Greeks, and the Latins. She wrote a history of the history of the eastern nations, and of Egypt, which was greatly commended by the ancients. She received no less honour from the patronage she afforded to the celebrated Longinus, who was one of her favourites, and who taught her the Greek tongue. She has also been praised for her great chastity, and her constancy, though she betrayed too often her propensities to cruelty and intoxication when in the midst of her officers. She fell into the hands of Aurelian about the 273d year of the Christian era. Flav. Vict.—Zos. &c.

ZENODŌRUS, a sculptor in the age of Nero. He made a statue of Mercury, as also a colossus for the emperor, which was 110 or 120 feet high and which was consecrated to the sun. The head of this colossus was some time after broken by Vespasian, who placed there the bust of an Apollo surrounded with seven beams, each of which was seven feet and a half-long. From this famous colossus the modern Coliseum whose ruins are now so much admired at Rome, took its name. Plin. 34, 7.

ZETUS, or ZETHUS a son of Jupiter and Antiope brother to Amphion The two brothers were born on mount Cithæron, where Antiope had fled to avoid the resentment of her father Nycteus. When they had attained the years of manhood, they collected a number of their friends to avenge the injuries which their mother had suffered from Dirce, the successor of Nycteus on the throne of Thebes and from his wife Dirce Dirce was put to death, and his wife tied to the tail of a wild bull that dragged her over rocks and precipices till she died The crown of Thebes was seized by the two brothers not only as the reward of their victory, but their inheritance and Zethus surrounded the capital of his dominions with a strong wall while his brother amused himself with playing on his lyre Music and verses were disagreeable to Zethus and, according to some he prevailed upon his brother no longer to pursue so unprofitable a study Hygin fab 7 — Paus 2, 6 etc — Apollod 3 5 et 10 — Horat ep 1, 18, 41

ZEUGIS or ZEUGITANA a district of Africa, in which Carthage was situated It extended from the river Tusca to the Hermæan promontory and from the coast to the mountains that separated it from Byzacium Nothing is known with any certainty concerning the origin of the name Zeugitana but it is generally said to have been derived from the Zeugantes who dwelled hereabouts they were an aboriginal people, and are supposed to have been connected with the neighbouring Byzantes who gave name to Byzacium Isid Hist 14, 5 — Plin 5 4

ZEUXIS a celebrated painter, born at Heraclea, which some suppose to be the Heraclea in Sicily. He flourished about 468 years before the Christian era and was the disciple of Apollodorus, his contemporary which Parrhasius, in the art of painting he surpassed not only all his contemporaries but also his master, and became so sensible, and at the same time so proud of the value of his pieces, that he refused to sell them, observing that no sum of money, however great, was sufficient to buy them. He is said by Quintilian to have been the first who understood the management of light and shade, and to have excelled in colouring; but he is censured for giving too much bulk to his heads and comeliness to his limbs, which is ascribed to an imitation of the strength and grandeur of Homer's manner His most celebrated paintings were his Jupiter sitting upon a throne, surrounded by the gods his Hercules strangling the serpents in the presence of Amphitryon, Alcmene his modest penelope[illegible] which was in Italy This last piece he had painted at the request of the people of Crotona, and that he might not be without a model, they sent him the most beautiful of their virgins. He took examined their naked beauties, and retained five, from whose elegance and graces united he conceived in his mind the form of the most perfect woman in the universe, which his pencil at last executed with wonderful success [illegible] with Parrhasius is well known [Vid. Parrhasius,] but though he represented nature in such perfection and copied all her beauties with such exactness, he often found himself deceived. His painted grapes, and formed an idea of the goodness of his piece from the birds which came to eat the fruit on the canvass. But he soon acknowledged that the whole was an ill executed piece, as the figure of the man who carried the grapes was not done with sufficient expression to terrify the birds According to some, Zeuxis died from laughing at a comical picture which he had made of an old woman Cic de Inv 2, 1.—Plut in Par &c.

ZOILUS, a sophist and grammarian of Amphipolis, B. C. 259 He rendered himself known by his severe criticisms on the works of Isocrates and Plato and the poems of Homer, for which he received the name of Homeromastix or the chastiser of Homer. He presented his criticisms to Ptolemy Philadelphus, but they were rejected with indignation, though the author declared that he starved for want of bread Some say that Zoilus was cruelly stoned to death, or exposed on a cross, by order of Ptolemy, while others support, that he was burned alive at Smyrna. The name of Zoilus is generally applied to austere critics The works of this unfortunate grammarian are lost. Ælian V. H. 11 10 — Dionys Hal. — Ovid de Rem. Am. 365.

ZONARAS, Johannes a Byzantine historian, who flourished in the 11th and 12th centuries. He was raised to distinguished honours in the court of the emperor Alexius Comnenus, but resigned them and retired as a monk to mount Athos. Many works composed by him in the latter part of his life, we have his Annals, Lexicon, in 3 books, including a general history from the beginning of the world down to A. D. 1118 It consists of abridgments or extracts from larger works, and exhibits great inequality of style. The history of the Jews is given first, then that of the Greeks, that of the Roman republic, and lastly that of the Roman empire In the latter part he closely follows Dion Cassius. Zonaras has also written an Homilies which is [illegible] a compendium of that of Synesius. The Annals are found in the collections of the Byzantine historians. The lexicon was published by Tiebmann with the lexicon of Photius, 2 vols. 4to.

SOPATER, a Paphian, son of [illegible] who, to show his disinterestedness [illegible] the love of flattery, while he [illegible] practised, not only them that he had received such a treatment from his royal master because he had advised him to raise the siege, as the city was impregnable. This was credited by the Babylonians, and Zopyrus was appointed commander of all their forces. When he had totally gained their confidence, he betrayed the city into the hands of Darius, for which he was liberally rewarded. The regard of Darius for Zopyrus could never be more strongly expressed than in what he used often to say, that he had rather have Zopyrus mutilated than twenty Babylons. Herod 3, 4, &c.—Plut in Apoph. Reg 3—Justin. 1, 10.——A physician in the age of Mithridates. He gave the monarch a description of an antidote which would prevail against all sorts of poisons. The experiment was tried upon criminals, and succeeded.

ZOROANDA, a part of Taurus, where the Tigris opened a subterraneous passage. Plin. 6, 27.

ZOROASTER, a king of Bactria, supposed to have lived in the age of Ninus, king of Assyria some time before the Trojan war. According to Justin, he first invented magic, or the doctrines of the Magi, and rendered himself known by his deep and acute researches in philosophy, the origin of the world and the study of astronomy. He was respected by his subjects and contemporaries for his abilities as a monarch, a lawgiver, and a philosopher, and though many of his doctrines are puerile and ridiculous, yet his followers are still found in numbers in the wilds of Persia and the extensive provinces of India. Like Pythagoras, Zoroaster admitted no visible object of devotion except fire, which he considered as the most proper emblem of a supreme being; which doctrines seem to have been preserved by Numa in the worship and ceremonies which he instituted in honour of Vesta. According to some of the moderns, the doctrines, the laws, and regulations of this celebrated Bactrian are still extant, and they have been lately introduced into Europe in a French translation by M. Anquetil. The age of Zoroaster is unknown, that many speak of two, three, four, and even six lawgivers of that name. Some authors support that two persons only of this Tourished, describe the first as an astronomer, living in Babylon, 2000 B.C., whilst the era of the other, who is supposed to have been a native of Persia, and restorer of the religion of the Magi, is fixed by some 519 years B.C. The learned Hyde, and after him Dr Prideaux and several others are of opinion, that Zoroaster was the same with the Zerdusht of the Persians, who was a great patriarch of the Magi, and who lived between the beginning of the reign of Cyrus, and the latter end of that of Darius Hystapes. Dr Warburton censures Hyde and Prideaux for making Zoroaster in early Bactrian lawgiver, and a late Persian false prophet, and says that this whole history of him is a mere fable, dictated by all learned antiquity, and supported only by the romantic relations of late writers under the caliphs. Justin. 1, 1 de Civ. 21, 14 Oros 1, 4.—Plin 7, 10.

ZOSIMUS an officer in the reign of Julian the younger, about the year 400. A Christian era. He wrote the history of the Roman emperors in Greek, from the age of Augustus to the beginning of the 5th century, which only the five first books and the beginning of the sixth are extant. In the first of these he is very succinct in his account from the time of Augustus to the reign of Diocletian, but succeeding he becomes more diffuse and interesting. His composition is written with elegance but not much fidelity, and he has showed his malevolence against the Christians in his history of Constantine and his successors. The best editions of Zosimus are that of Cellarius 8vo Jena 1679, and that of Reitemier 8vo Lipsiæ 1784.

ZOSTERIA, a surname of Minerva, because the statues under that name in the temples of Thebes in Bœotia. The word signifies a girdle, and armed for battle, words synonymous among the ancients. Paus 9, 17.—Hom Il 2, 478. 11

ZUCHIS, a lake to the east of the Syrtis Major, with a town of the same name, famous for purple dye and salt fish. Strab. 17.

ZUGANTES. Vid. Zeugis.

ZYGIA, a surname of Juno, because she presided over marriage (a ζευγνυμι jungo). She is the same as the Pronuba of the Latins. Paul. 3, 3.
